INTRODUCTION

INTRODUCTION

En 1952, après trois ans de réorganisation interne, le ministère des Affaires extérieures était enfin en mesure de poursuivre adéquatement ses nouvelles activités, tant au Canada qu'à l'étranger.<sup>1</sup> Une fois ce projet mené à bien, Arnold Heeney quitta son poste de sous-secrétaire aux Affaires extérieures en avril et devint le premier délégué permanent du Canada auprès du nouveau Conseil de l'Atlantique Nord à Paris. Dana Wilgress, haut commissaire au Royaume-Uni, succéda à M. Heeney, cependant que Norman Robertson remplaça M. Wilgress à Londres. En septembre, de nouveaux changements se produisirent au sein du sous-secrétariat. R.A. MacKay et R.M. Macdonnell furent nommés sous-secrétaires adjoints en remplacement de Escott Reid, qui, de sous-secrétaire suppléant, devint haut commissaire en Inde, et de H.O. Moran, qui fut nommé ambassadeur en Turquie. En novembre, Charles Ritchie, sous-secrétaire adjoint, était promu au poste de sous-secrétaire suppléant. L'expansion des missions, qui s'était considérablement ralentie au moment de la réorganisation, put reprendre en 1952, bien qu'à un rythme plus modéré qu'au cours des premières années d'après-guerre (Chapitre I). Les nouvelles missions avaient essentiellement comme objectif de promouvoir les intérêts commerciaux du Canada à l'étranger (document 36).

La guerre de Corée continuait d'occuper le devant de la scène internationale, alors que les négociations de paix entre le Commandement des forces des Nations unies, placé sous la direction des Américains et les autorités chinoises et nord-coréennes retenaient de plus en plus l'attention générale (Chapitre II). Compte tenu du rôle central joué par les États-Unis dans la conduite de la guerre et au cours des pourparlers de paix, les responsables canadiens suivaient avec un intérêt de tous les instants l'évolution de la politique américaine à cet égard. Comme les responsables américains avaient tendance à prendre des décisions unilatérales, Ottawa ne cessa de rappeler à Washington combien l'information et la consultation étaient essentielles avant de passer à l'action. Toujours dans le but d'exercer une plus grande influence sur les politiques américaines, les responsables canadiens ont aussi cherché à maximiser le rôle des Nations unies lors des débats sur la Corée. Malgré des résultats mitigés, de telles démarches ont néanmoins eu pour effet d'amener les États-Unis, initialement peu favorables à cette idée, à accepter une résolution de l'Assemblée générale parrainée par l'Inde et ayant trait à la libération des prisonniers de guerre.

La délégation canadienne aux Nations unies s'occupa par ailleurs d'une foule d'autres dossiers qui retenaient l'attention de l'ONU (Chapitre III). Ainsi, même si des sujets tels que la Commission de conciliation des Nations unies pour la Palestine, l'Afrique du Sud-Ouest, la Tunisie et le Maroc ne le

INTRODUCTION

In 1952, the Department of External Affairs emerged from a three-year administrative reorganization undertaken to enable the Department to sustain its expanded operations at headquarters and abroad.<sup>1</sup> In April, Arnold Heeney, who as under-secretary had been responsible for the project, left that post to become Canada's first permanent representative to the newly established North Atlantic Council in Paris. Heeney was succeeded by Dana Wilgress, the High Commissioner to the United Kingdom. Norman Robertson replaced Wilgress in London. In September, there were other changes in the under-secretarial group. R.A. MacKay and R.M. Macdonnell were appointed as assistant under-secretaries, following the departures of Escott Reid, the deputy under-secretary, who became High Commissioner to India, and H.O. Moran, who was named Ambassador to Turkey. In November, Charles Ritchie was promoted from assistant to deputy under-secretary. Post expansion, which had slowed considerably during the reorganization, resumed in 1952, although at a more measured pace than that of the early postwar years (Chapter I). The new missions created were primarily designed to promote Canada's trade interests abroad (document 36).

The Korean conflict continued to dominate the international agenda, with the armistice negotiations between the American-led United Nations Command and North Korean and Chinese authorities occupying increasing attention (Chapter II). Given the central role of the United States in the conduct of the war and in the armistice talks, that country's policies were a major preoccupation of Canadian officials. Faced with the tendency of American policy makers to act unilaterally, Ottawa pressed upon Washington the importance of providing full information and adequate opportunities for consultation in advance of contemplated actions. Canadian officials also sought to maximize the role of the United Nations in deliberations on Korea in order to enhance their capacity to influence American policies. In this, Canada achieved mixed results, although it was instrumental in persuading the United States to agree to an Indian-sponsored General Assembly resolution on the release of prisoners of war, which American officials had initially been unwilling to accept.

Beyond Korea, the Canadian delegation to the United Nations was involved in a wide range of issues which came before the organization (Chapter III). Although Canada had little direct stake in such matters as the Palestine Conciliation Commission, South West Africa, and Tunisia and Morocco, it took considerable interest in them. Its approach was conditioned by its NATO and Commonwealth associations in the context of continuing East-West tension. An important tribute to the role that Canada had played at the United concernaient pas directement, le Canada s'intéressa vivement à ces questions pour la bonne raison que, en tant que membre de l'OTAN et du Commonwealth, il était déjà accoutumé aux perpétuelles tensions Est-Ouest. En octobre 1952, les Nations unies rendirent un vibrant hommage au rôle que le Canada avait joué au sein de cette organisation depuis sa fondation en élisant Lester B. Pearson à la présidence de la septième session de l'Assemblée générale.

Parfois, la délégation canadienne à l'ONU réclamait la participation d'autres ministères que celui des Affaires extérieures (Chapitre IV). Ceux-ci collaboraient habituellement de bonne grâce, mais des frictions ne manquaient pas de se produire à l'occasion, comme ce fut notamment le cas au sujet de la Commission du désarmement. Les responsables du ministère de la Défense nationale étant peu enclins à s'occuper de questions politiques, la délégation canadienne ne put participer pleinement aux débats de la Commission. Par ailleurs, le ministère des Affaires extérieures était en désaccord avec celui des Finances sur la question des principes régissant les contributions volontaires aux diverses institutions de l'ONU. Aux Affaires extérieures, on voyait d'un mauvais œil les tentatives des responsables des Finances d'appliquer des critères rigoureux de performance financière relativement aux contributions canadiennes. Le ministère des Affaires extérieures souhaitait plus de souplesse afin d'apporter son soutien à certains programmes louables. Dans le cas des organisations internationales fonctionnelles, les deux ministères s'entendaient toutefois assez bien sur l'importance qu'il y avait, pour leur bon fonctionnement, de doter ces organismes de programmes conçus avec soin et de méthodes administratives et comptables efficaces, tout en veillant à ce que les contributions financières qui leur étaient versées par les États participants fussent équitables.

Après la réorganisation de l'OTAN, qui eut pour conséquence la mise sur pied d'un secrétariat placé sous la direction d'un secrétaire général et d'un conseil permanent ayant leur siège à Paris, il devint essentiel de détacher une délégation canadienne permanente auprès de cet organisme (Chapitre V). La question de l'élaboration d'accords satisfaisants relativement aux consultations entre les «trois grands» (les États-Unis, la France et le Royaume-Uni) et les autres membres de l'alliance fut au cœur des préoccupations de la délégation et des responsables à Ottawa tout au long de 1952. Malgré l'intérêt qu'il portait à l'établissement de liens appropriés entre les pays de l'OTAN et l'Australie et la Nouvelle-Zélande, le Canada continua de s'opposer à l'idée de voir l'alliance étendre ses responsabilités aux colonies des puissances européennes. En vertu de ce principe, le premier ministre Saint-Laurent s'opposa vigoureusement à une demande formulée par les autorités françaises en vue d'acheminer vers l'Indochine l'assistance militaire offerte à la France sous forme d'aide mutuelle.

Le gouvernement canadien avait entrepris des négociations avec le Mexique et le Pérou relativement à des accords sur le transport aérien destinés à établir de nouveaux liens avec ces pays (Chapitre VI). Lors de la sixième session de l'Assemblée de l'OACI, Ottawa dut par ailleurs contrer une offensive concertée de la part d'un groupe d'États arabes, européens et latino-américains désireux Nations since its foundation was the election of L.B. Pearson as President of the Seventh Session of the General Assembly in October 1952.

The delegation's participation in certain issues at the United Nations required the involvement of departments other than External Affairs (Chapter IV). While working relations with other departments were generally cooperative, on occasion there were differences. This was the case with regard to the Disarmament Commission. Because of the unwillingness of National Defence officials to cooperate in the formulation of policy, the delegation was unable to participate fully in that body's deliberations. Similarly, External Affairs and the Department of Finance were at odds over the principles governing voluntary contributions to United Nations agencies. External viewed with some concern attempts by Finance to attach strict financial performance criteria to Canada's contributions. It favoured a more flexible approach which would facilitate the operation of worthwhile programs. Within functional international organizations, the two departments were in general agreement that well-conceived programs, sound budgetary and administrative practices, and equitable financial contributions by participating states were important in ensuring effective operation.

The reorganization of NATO which resulted in the creation of a secretariat, headed by a Secretary-General and a permanent council, headquartered in Paris, required the establishment of a permanent Canadian delegation to the organization (Chapter V). One of the major matters occupying the delegation and policy makers in Ottawa during 1952 was the question of working out satisfactory arrangements for consultation between the "Big Three" (the United States, the United Kingdom and France) and the other members of the alliance. Although Ottawa was interested in establishing suitable liaison arrangements between NATO countries and Australia and New Zealand, it remained opposed to extending the alliance's responsibilities to the dependencies of European powers. On this basis Prime Minister St. Laurent strongly opposed a French request to direct to Indochina military assistance offered to France as mutual aid.

The Canadian government was engaged in negotiations for air agreements with Mexico and Peru, which would establish new links with those countries (Chapter VI). In addition, Ottawa had to deal with a concerted attempt by a group of Arab, European and Latin American states at the Sixth Session of the International Civil Aviation Organization to transfer the organization's headquarters from Montreal to Europe or Latin America. The group's main goal was to lessen the influence of the United States in civil aviation matters. Also important was the cost of maintaining the headquarters in Montreal, and the refusal of Premier Maurice Duplessis' government and the City of Montreal to grant privileges and immunities falling within their jurisdiction to the organization and its employees, a factor that constrained Ottawa's capacity to deal with concerns that were raised. The Assembly narrowly defeated the proposal.

Commonwealth relations were primarily concerned with economic issues following the balance of payment crisis experienced by several sterling bloc de transférer en Europe ou en Amérique latine le siège central de l'organisation. Cette tentative visait principalement à réduire l'influence des États-Unis dans le domaine de l'aviation civile, mais une autre question revêtait une importance énorme dans ce débat: le coût élevé du maintien du siège social de l'organisation à Montréal, auquel s'ajoutait le refus du gouvernement de Maurice Duplessis et de la Ville de Montréal d'accorder à l'OACI et à ses employés les privilèges et les immunités relevant de leurs juridictions respectives, limitant ainsi d'autant la capacité d'intervention du gouvernement canadien. L'Assemblée rejeta malgré tout la proposition par une faible majorité.

Par suite de la crise de la balance des paiements que plusieurs pays du bloc sterling avaient traversée à la fin de 1951, les membres du Commonwealth étaient surtout préoccupés par des questions d'ordre économique (Chapitre VII). Lors de la réunion des ministres des Finances du Commonwealth qui eut lieu en janvier et lors de la Conférence économique du Commonwealth à laquelle les chefs de gouvernement participèrent à la fin novembre et au début décembre, les efforts portèrent principalement sur les mesures à prendre pour renforcer la position du bloc. Au cours de ces débats, le Canada put néanmoins plaider avec succès en faveur d'une libéralisation du commerce international tout en maintenant sa position en tant qu'exportateur au sein des pays de la zone sterling. Le Plan Colombo retint par ailleurs passablement l'attention d'Ottawa quoique, à compter de 1952, il fut moins question d'élaborer des politiques à cet égard que d'administrer le programme canadien et d'entamer des négociations sur les projets à venir.

Les relations canado-américaines étaient dominées par des préoccupations d'ordre économique et stratégique (Chapitre VIII). Par suite de l'accroissement de la puissance militaire soviétique, le besoin se fit de plus en plus sentir, surtout du côté des États-Unis, d'assurer la protection aérienne du territoire nord-américain. Après avoir étudié les demandes des Américains en fonction de leur nécessité militaire, les dirigeants des Forces armées canadiennes cherchèrent à intensifier la coopération dans certains domaines. Ainsi, au début de 1952, un haut responsable de la Force aérienne canadienne suggéra l'idée d'un commandement intégré de défense antiaérienne pour tout le territoire nord-américain (document 698). De son côté, la direction des Affaires extérieures était plutôt portée à craindre les conséquences que de tels accords bilatéraux pourraient avoir pour la souveraineté canadienne.

Le Canada était aussi grandement préoccupé par les désaccords qui subsistaient entre l'administration Truman et le Congrès au sujet de la mise en œuvre de la politique économique américaine. L'incapacité du gouvernement américain à persuader le Congrès d'approuver le Projet d'accord entre le Canada et les États-Unis pour la canalisation et l'aménagement hydro-électrique du bassin des Grands Lacs et du Saint-Laurent poussa Ottawa à donner suite, avec la bénédiction du président américain, à son propre projet. Le gouvernement canadien s'inquiétait également au sujet de la loi imposant des quotas aux importations de produits laitiers aux États-Unis. Ottawa était inquiet des effets d'une telle mesure sur les exportations canadiennes et il countries in late 1951 (Chapter VII). How to strengthen the position of the bloc was the main focus of the meeting of Commonwealth Finance Ministers in January, and the Commonwealth Economic Conference, attended by heads of government, in late November and early December. Canada's role in those deliberations reflected its interest in maintaining a liberal system of international trade, as well as its own export position vis-à-vis sterling area countries. Colombo Plan matters also occupied considerable attention in Ottawa, although by 1952 the focus had shifted away from policy to the administration of Canada's program, and negotiations for future projects.

Canada's relations with the United States were dominated by strategic and economic issues (Chapter VIII). The growth of Soviet military capabilities led to an increasing emphasis on North American air defence, the impetus for which came from the United States. Canadian military authorities, who approached American requests for new defence projects from the standpoint of military necessity, sought to intensify cooperation in some areas. For instance, in early 1952, a senior Canadian air force official advanced the concept of an integrated North American air defence command (document 698). External Affairs officials, by contrast, tended to be more sensitive to the implications of bilateral defence arrangements for Canadian sovereignty.

An important Canadian concern vis-à-vis the United States related to disagreements between the Truman administration and Congress over the conduct of economic policy. The administration's failure to persuade Congress to approve the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Basin Agreement for the joint construction of the St. Lawrence Seaway and Power Project prompted Ottawa, with the President's approval, to proceed with its own plan. The government was also concerned about legislation imposing quotas on dairy products imported into the United States. Ottawa's anxiety stemmed from the effect of this action on Canadian exports and the possible implications for multilateral trade liberalization.

Canada's views of developments in Western Europe continued to be conditioned by its relationship with the United Kingdom and membership in NATO (Chapter IX). Although External Affairs was kept well informed of the progress of European integration by its missions abroad, the department's files contain little evidence of attempts to assess the implications for Canada. Ottawa maintained a more active interest in the work of the Organization for European Economic Cooperation, the main focus being the steps taken by European countries in the direction of currency convertibility and trade liberalization.

The government's familiarity with political developments in the Middle East, on the other hand, was limited, although the need for greater understanding was recognized. This problem was experienced especially at the United Nations where the Canadian delegation had to respond to issues, stemming from continuing Arab-Israeli tensions, which frequently came before the General Assembly. The instrumental role played by the delegation in averting a breakdown of the Palestinian Conciliation Commission, at the Sixth General Assembly, largely due to the presence of Elizabeth MacCallum, External's craignait ses répercussions éventuelles sur la libéralisation des échanges multilatéraux.

Le Canada continuait d'évaluer les changements qui se produisaient en Europe de l'Ouest en fonction de ses liens avec le Royaume-Uni et de son appartenance à l'OTAN (Chapitre IX). Même si les missions canadiennes à l'étranger tenaient le Ministère des Affaires extérieures au courant des progrès réalisés au niveau de l'intégration européenne, il n'est guère fait mention, dans les dossiers du Ministère, des tentatives d'en évaluer les conséquences pour le Canada. Ottawa était plus directement intéressé aux travaux de l'Organisation européenne de coopération économique, son attention étant principalement tournée vers les mesures prises par les pays européens pour assurer la convertibilité de leurs monnaies respectives et parvenir à une plus grande libéralisation de leurs échanges commerciaux.

Le gouvernement canadien était par ailleurs moins familiarisé avec la situation qui prévalait au Moyen-Orient, mais il demeurait persuadé de la nécessité d'en apprendre davantage sur le sujet. Il prit notamment conscience de ses lacunes à cet égard le jour où la délégation canadienne aux Nations unies dut prendre position sur des questions fréquemment soulevées à l'Assemblée générale par suite des perpétuelles tensions israélo-arabes. Lors de la sixième Assemblée générale, la délégation canadienne contribua, en grande partie grâce à Elizabeth MacCallum, la principale experte en la matière au sein du Ministère, à empêcher l'éclatement de la Commission de conciliation des Nations unies pour la Palestine, ce qui ne fit que confirmer l'utilité de posséder de solides connaissances sur cette région (document 231).

Comme les rapports bilatéraux entre le Canada et l'Union soviétique et les pays de l'Est demeuraient limités, la plupart des activités des missions canadiennes en place à Moscou et dans les autres capitales de l'Europe de l'Est consistaient à faire état de l'évolution de la situation dans ces pays (Chapitre X). Les dépêches reproduites donnent une idée de l'orientation prise par la mission à Moscou.

En 1952, la politique canadienne en Extrême-Orient était axée surtout sur le Japon (Chapitre XI). L'entrée en vigueur, en avril de cette même année, du traité de paix fut suivie du rétablissement intégral des relations diplomatiques entre le Canada et le Japon. L'un des principaux points à l'ordre du jour des deux pays fut la conclusion d'un nouvel accord commercial. La situation en Indochine retenait également l'attention du gouvernement canadien. Tout en décidant, en décembre 1952, de procéder à une reconnaissance conditionnelle du Laos, du Vietnam et du Cambodge en tant qu'«États associés au sein de l'Union française», Ottawa fit preuve de prudence en rejetant les nouvelles tentatives de la France pour obtenir l'aide de l'OTAN dans cette région.

La mise sur pied, en 1952, de nouvelles missions en Amérique latine et la décision d'envoyer une importante délégation commerciale dans cette région au début de 1953 traduisaient la volonté du Canada d'entretenir des liens économiques plus étroits avec les pays d'Amérique latine. Toutefois, lorsque les États-Unis invitèrent officieusement le Canada à se joindre à l'Organisation des États américains, les responsables des Affaires extérieures crurent leading expert on the region, demonstrated the value of such expertise (document 231).

As a result of Canada's bilateral interaction with the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe being limited, much of the activity of the missions in Moscow and other Eastern European capitals consisted of reporting on developments in those countries (Chapter X). A selection of despatches indicating trends being followed by the mission in Moscow is printed.

The main focus of Canadian policy in the Far East in 1952 was Japan (Chapter XI). The coming into force of the peace treaty in April was followed by the restoration of full diplomatic relations between the two countries. The principal item on the bilateral agenda was the conclusion of a new trade agreement. Also receiving attention was the situation in Indochina. While Ottawa decided to extend qualified recognition to Laos, Vietnam and Cambodia as "Associated States within the French Union," in December 1952, it maintained a cautious attitude, rejecting renewed French efforts to secure aid to the region for NATO purposes.

The creation of new posts in Latin America during 1952, together with the decision to despatch a major trade mission to that area in early 1953, demonstrated Canada's interest in cultivating closer economic ties with the countries of the region. However, the generally negative response among External Affairs officials to an informal American overture to join the Organization of American States indicated that Canada was reluctant to play a larger political role in Latin America.

In selecting documents for this volume, I have been guided by the principles set out in the Introduction to Volume 7 (pp. ix-xi) of this series. One source of difficulty in following the principles was the huge growth of the postwar documentary record, reflecting Canada's expanding foreign policy agenda. To some extent it was possible to compensate for this by relying more heavily than previous editors on summary documents such as the reports of the weekly meetings of heads of division, Cabinet Conclusions and documents prepared for cabinet. Even so, the amount of material was such that a more selective approach had to be adopted to the source material and subjects examined.

Accordingly, I decided to confine comprehensive coverage to the files of the Department of External Affairs, the L.B. Pearson papers and the records of the Privy Council Office, the last as a result of the PCO's centrality in the Ottawa policy process. Other collections were consulted only when required to complete the examination of individual topics.

A second source of difficulty was the complexity of some subjects by comparison with the wartime and early postwar years. To have dealt with such subjects adequately would have required the inclusion of a much greater number of documents than could have been accommodated in the volume. To have done so, moreover, would have given such lengthy treatment to those subjects as to distort the balance of importance of the issues arising during the period. These considerations led to the omission of certain highly complex and detailed subjects such as the annual review and mutual aid processes in généralement bon de refuser l'invitation, ce qui montre que le Canada hésitait à jouer un rôle politique accru en Amérique latine.

On trouvera dans l'introduction au Volume 7 (pp. viii-x) les principes qui m'ont guidé dans le choix des documents contenus dans le présent volume. Il a toutefois été difficile d'appliquer ces principes à la lettre à cause de l'impresionnante somme de documents qui datent de l'après-guerre, et qui sont autant de témoins de la multiplication des activités du Canada en matière de politique étrangère. Il m'a été possible, dans une certaine mesure, de contourner cette difficulté en m'appuyant davantage que mes prédécesseurs sur des documents de synthèse tels que rapports de réunions hebdomadaires des chefs de direction, conclusions du Cabinet ou documents préparés à l'intention du Cabinet. Il m'a néanmoins fallu faire un tri parmi ces trop nombreuses sources et les innombrables sujets à ma disposition.

J'ai donc décidé de concentrer mon attention sur les dossiers du ministère des Affaires extérieures et de L.B. Pearson et sur les documents du Bureau du Conseil privé (dans ce dernier cas, en raison du rôle central que le Bureau du Conseil privé joue dans les prises de décisions politiques à Ottawa). J'ai consulté d'autres dossiers au besoin, notamment lorsqu'il me fallait compléter les renseignements que je possédais sur un thème particulier.

Autre facteur de difficulté : certains sujets étaient devenus plus complexes qu'ils ne l'étaient pendant ou immédiatement après la guerre. Pour traiter ces sujets en profondeur, il m'aurait fallu inclure davantage de documents que ce volume n'en peut contenir. Et quand même la chose serait possible, ces sujets prendraient trop d'importance par rapport à d'autres questions plus caractéristiques de cette période. Par conséquent, j'ai renoncé à aborder des questions aussi détaillées et complexes que le rapport annuel de l'OTAN et les dispositions de cet organisme relativement à l'aide mutuelle. J'ose espérer que les sujets retenus donneront un aperçu des grandes orientations prises par le Canada concernant les domaines ainsi évacués.

Certains sujets n'ont pas été éliminés uniquement pour des raisons de complexité. Si certains documents ne sont pas reproduits, c'est que je n'en ai trouvé aucune trace dans les dossiers consultés. C'est notamment le cas en ce qui concerne l'énergie atomique.

L'édition du présent volume est basée sur les mêmes principes que ceux décrits dans l'introduction au Volume 9 (pp. xviii-xx). Une croix (+) à la fin d'une référence à un autre document indique que le document en question n'est pas reproduit dans le volume. Dans le texte d'un document, des points de suspension . . . indiquent une omission par le compilateur.

J'ai eu accès à tous les documents conservés dans les fichiers du registre central du ministère des Affaires extérieures, à ceux du Bureau du Conseil privé et à ceux de L.B. Pearson. Les préposés des autres bibliothèques m'ont aimablement permis de consulter au besoin les documents dont ils sont les dépositaires. Le ministère des Affaires extérieures et du Commerce extérieur du Canada m'a refusé la permission de publier deux des documents qui devaient figurer dans le présent ouvrage. Conformément aux Lois sur l'accès à NATO. I hope that the main lines of Canadian foreign policy in the subject areas affected will be clear from the issues chosen for treatment.

Complexity was not always the reason for omitting subjects. The absence of documents on some subjects reflects the lack of material in the relevant files. This was the case with atomic energy.

The editorial devices used in this volume are similar to those described in the Introduction to Volume 9 (p. xix). A dagger (+) indicates that a document has not been printed, ellipses . . . indicate an editorial excision.

I was given full access to the available records in the central registry files of the Department of External Affairs, those of the Privy Council Office and the L.B. Pearson papers. The custodians of other collections were generous in granting access to materials when requested. Two documents selected for inclusion were withheld by External Affairs and International Trade Canada. Personal information was removed from documents 284, 430, 613 and 947 in compliance with the Access to Information and Privacy Acts. The remaining editorial exclusions were made to improve the clarity of individual documents.

I am grateful to Arthur Blanchette, the former Director of the department's Historical Division, and to John Hilliker, the present Head of the Historical Section, for advice and encouragement. Janet Bax, Director of the Academic Relations Division when the work was completed, was most supportive. I was assisted in the initial selection of documents by Christopher Cook and E.A. Kelly. Our research was made easier by the cooperation received from Jeannette K. Fournier, the former supervisor of the department's Semi-Active Records unit, and the archival staff of the National Archives of Canada. The technical editing group consisted of Isobel Cameron, Geneviève de Chantal, Elizabeth Heatherington, Dawn Jones, Liza Linklater and Laurel Pardy. I thank them all.

Ottawa, November [24?], 1952

ROYAL STYLE AND TITLES

This question has been under consideration by the various Governments of the Commonwealth since the Accession of Queen Elizabeth II. On April 5, 1952, the Commonwealth Relations Office asked each of these Governments for their views on the wording of the new Royal Style and Titles. More recently the Commonwealth Relations Office suggested that, in view of the varying replies to this inquiry, the matter might be arranged by a "personal discussion"; and that the presence of the Prime Ministers or their representatives in London at the Commonwealth Financial and Economic Conference in November would offer a most convenient opportunity for such a discussion. The Commonwealth Relations Office expressed the hope that this proposal would be generally acceptable and that the proposed discussions in London would enable Commonwealth Governments to reach a final agreement on the new form of the Royal Style and Titles.

Prime Ministers' Conference in 1949

2. When this matter was raised in London in 1949, there was general agreement that the Royal Style and Titles was archaic and needed to be changed to bring it into conformity with the existing structure of the Commonwealth. Although at that time no precise understanding was reached on how it might be done, there was general agreement that each Commonwealth country would use for its own purpose a title in which the country concerned would be mentioned by name and the other parts of the Commonwealth would be described in a generic phrase. A further suggestion was that, since the phrases "By the Grace of God" and "Defender of the Faith" — although traditional in the United Kingdom — might not be considered appropriate in all the other Commonwealth countries, it would be for the government of each country to consider whether one or both of these phrases should be omitted from the title adopted for use in that country. Subject to these two considerations the Prime Ministers agreed in the 1949 Conference on the desirability for the maximum possible measure of uniformity for the form of the Royal Style and Titles to be used in each country of the Commonwealth.

Preferences of the Various Commonwealth Governments

3. The preferences for the wording of the Royal Style and Titles, as submitted by the Commonwealth Governments in reply to the C.R.O. inquiry are attached as an appendix to this memorandum. These Governments agree on the desirability of having the Royal Style changed before the Coronation (although this ceremony does not include a full recital of the Royal Style and Titles); but there are wide divergences of view in the various preferences:

(a) Australia does not favour the United Kingdom's suggestion, primarily because Australia wishes both the United Kingdom and Australia to be mentioned by name in the title to be used in Australia.

(b) Neither of the Australian preferences would satisfy completely our desire that the Royal Style should emphasize the fact that the Queen is Queen of Canada, regardless of her sovereignty over other Commonwealth countries. Our view<sup>2</sup> is in strict accord with the present constitutional position, which is based on the concept of equality of status of all Commonwealth members. The first Australian preference would result in a cumbersome title and is, therefore, not likely to commend itself to the other Commonwealth governments. The second Australian suggestion is not in accord with the objectives, expressed at the 1949 Prime Ministers' Conference, that all members of the Commonwealth should be represented in the new Royal Style on an equal basis with the United Kingdom and that only one country would be named in the new Royal Style.

(c) Ceylon and Pakistan have expressed a preference for the shortest possible title and would be most unlikely to agree to a new Royal Style along the lines of the Australian proposal because it tends to emphasize the link between the United Kingdom and the other Commonwealth country concerned.

(d) South Africa has already gone on record as being unable to lend its support to the form of title suggested by Australia because, in the South Africans' view, the Australian proposal detracts from the equality of status of the members of the Commonwealth.

(e) Ceylon, Pakistan and South Africa do not wish to include the expressions "By the Grace of God" and "Defender of the Faith" in the new Royal Style and Titles.

Possible Alternatives

4. A number of possible alternatives may be raised in London:

(a) If it appears that no near-uniform title is likely to emerge from the discussions, the suggestion might be made that the whole matter be dropped and that the present Royal Style and Titles be retained. (The present title reads: "Elizabeth the Second, by the Grace of God, of Great Britain, Ireland, and the British Dominions beyond the Seas, Queen, Defender of the Faith.") In my view it would be most undesirable to postpone the matter any longer, because so much of the ground work has already been completed; because the Coronation presents a convenient opportunity to bring the Royal Style to date; because there has been general agreement on the need to have the present archaic and unrealistic title revised; and because from time to time we have not my personal view. St. L[aurant]

encountered difficulties over the present form of the Royal Style and Titles (Mr. Turgeon's<sup>3</sup> new Letter of Credence was the latest case in point).

(b) It may be suggested that near-uniformity could be reached if Australia, Ceylon and Pakistan would agree to the 1949 formula, from which the Commonwealth countries' preferences do not vary greatly. The Australians might be persuaded to change their view but the position of Ceylon and Pakistan is difficult. Although at the Prime Ministers' Conference in 1949 Ceylon and Pakistan seemed to accept in principle the suggested formula, there is reason to believe that they might now find difficulty in doing so. This is perhaps more true of Pakistan than Ceylon. You can appreciate the undesirability of bringing pressure to bear on the Governments of Ceylon and Pakistan to agree to something which they do not want and which might prove politically embarrassing for them. Moreover, not too far in the background lies the possibility that one or [sic] both of these countries might eventually follow in the footsteps of India and choose to become a republic.

(c) The suggestion might be put forward that the new Royal Style and Titles should follow the Accession formulae which read in part: "Queen of this realm and of all Her other realms and territories." This wording is unlikely to be acceptable to the United Kingdom authorities, who have expressed the view that a title which is to be used on formal occasions or informal instances (such as Heads of State Treaties or Credentials) would be unsuitable if it included no geographical content. This view in my opinion has considerable force. I should, therefore, be reluctant to give support to a form of Royal Style which made no mention of the country concerned.

(d) In our present preference, which has been communicated to the C.R.O., the words "By the Grace of God" and "Defender of the Faith" have been retained. As previously mentioned Ceylon, Pakistan and South Africa would prefer to omit these two expressions. If it would facilitate agreement on the other controversial points, you might wish to consider whether their omission from the new Royal Style and Titles would be acceptable in Canada. In spite of their historical and religious significance, primarily in the United Kingdom, the phrases are inconsistent with the present structure of the Commonwealth and serve no useful purpose in inter-Commonwealth or international relations. Their omission from the new Royal Style might meet with some opposition from the more tradition-minded elements in Canada, but, if such an omission would serve to bring about a satisfactory solution of the complex titles problem, the step might be worth taking. However, there is no indication at the present time that Canadian initiative in this direction would achieve the desired results. The phrases might well be retained in the Royal Style as optional.

(e) If uniformity cannot be obtained, there might be considerable merit in allowing each country to use the Royal Style and Titles of its own preference. The use of varying titles is not likely to detract from the value or function of the Crown as a common and unifying feature within the Commonwealth. Already India occupies a special position in relation to the Crown and, in a sense, this might constitute a precedent as regards the Royal Style and Titles. If any sort of agreement is to be reached before the Coronation, perhaps this alternative offers the best that can be hoped for.

Hon. W.F.A. Turgeon, Ambassador in Ireland and, concurrently from February 1952, Minister to Portugal.

5. The recommended Canadian position, as outlined in the preceding paragraphs, is flexible enough to permit us to agree to any of the suggested formulae, except that proposed by Australia and that proposed separately by Ceylon and Pakistan. The importance of bringing the Royal Style and Titles into line with reality, regardless of whether a near-uniform title can be agreed upon, has, I think, been fully recognized by all Commonwealth Governments. It would be unfortunate if the opportunity afforded by the forthcoming meeting of Prime Ministers in London were to be lost.<sup>4</sup>

[APPENDICE/APPENDIX]

Australia:

The Australian Government has informed the Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations that they would prefer a title which specified all Commonwealth countries by name so that it could be used uniformly throughout the Commonwealth thus signifying its unity. If this suggestion does not commend itself generally, the Australian Government proposes that the form of the title should be:

"Elizabeth the Second, by the Grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, Australia and of all Her other realms and territories Queen, Head of the Commonwealth, Defender of the Faith."

Canada:

"Elizabeth the Second, by the Grace of God, Queen of Canada and of Her other realms and territories, Head of the Commonwealth, Defender of the Faith."

Ceylon:

"Elizabeth the Second, Queen, Head of the Commonwealth."

New Zealand:

"Elizabeth the Second, by the Grace of God, of New Zealand and of Her other realms and territories Queen, Head of the Commonwealth, Defender of the Faith."

Pakistan:

"Elizabeth the Second, Queen, Head of the Commonwealth."

South Africa:

"Elizabeth the Second, Queen of South Africa and of her other realms and territories, Head of the Commonwealth."

The United Kingdom:

"Elizabeth the Second, by the Grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and of all her other realms and territories Queen, Head of the Commonwealth, Defender of the Faith."

ROYAL STYLE AND TITLES

1. At a meeting on December 4 at the Commonwealth Relations Office, at which the United Kingdom was represented by Lord Salisbury and Lord Swinton, the other Commonwealth countries by the heads of their delegations, and India by its High Commissioner in London, it was quickly clear that South Africa would not accept a royal style different from that which it had proposed in the 1949 discussions, while Australia would find it extremely difficult to agree to a royal style that did not include a reference to the United Kingdom in it.

2. Lord Salisbury and Mr. St. Laurent indicated that for the sake of uniformity, their governments would probably be prepared to accept a style based either on the South African formula or on the second Australian suggestion which would incorporate "The United Kingdom" in the titles to be used by overseas members of the Commonwealth. New Zealand much preferred the Australian suggestions. Ceylon, which had originally wished no territorial description in the royal title, rallied to the South African view. Pakistan indicated that it would use exactly the royal style adopted by the United Kingdom, less "By the Grace of God" and "Defender of the Faith", i.e. without any reference to Pakistan by name. The High Commissioner for India explained that as India was a republic, it had no observations to offer on the royal style used by the other members of the Commonwealth, but was concerned only that no change was made in the description of the Queen as "Head of the Commonwealth".

3. After a very brief discussion, it was recognized by the meeting that neither exact identity nor a uniform formula for local variations was likely to be attainable. Mr. Menzies and Mr. St. Laurent felt there were valid historical and constitutional reasons for associating the United Kingdom in the royal style and titles to be used by other members of the Commonwealth; notably, the United Kingdom was the custodian of the Royal Succession both in statutory senses and otherwise.

4. Accordingly it was agreed that the representatives of the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia and New Zealand would recommend to their parliaments the adoption of a royal style, which in the case of Canada would read: "Elizabeth the Second, by the Grace of God, of the United Kingdom, Canada, and of All Other Her Realms and Territories, Queen, Head of the Commonwealth, and Defender of the Faith". The United Kingdom title will probably refer to "The United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland". The representatives of Canada, Australia and New Zealand thought there were advantages in referring to "The United Kingdom" tout court in their several styles for the Queen.

5. It was similarly agreed that South Africa and Ceylon would give the Queen the style of "Elizabeth the Second, Queen of South Africa (or Ceylon) and of Her Other Realms and Territories, Head of the Commonwealth". Pakistan will follow the precise form used in the United Kingdom, minus, as I have said "Grace of God" and "Defender of the Faith".

6. It is hoped to prepare an agreed communique indicating the concurrence of the governments concerned to the others seeking the modifications they severely feel to be required in the Queen's title. Since the Commonwealth parliaments are seldom simultaneously in session, an agreed legislative timetable appeared to be impracticable, but it was thought that the countries concerned might proceed with their respective domestic legislation with a proviso that the new royal styles and titles should be brought into force by proclamation on an agreed date, preferably before the Coronation.

Communiqué de presse du cabinet du premier ministre

Press Release by Office of Prime Minister

Ottawa, December 12, 1952

The Prime Ministers and other representatives of Commonwealth countries assembled in London for the Commonwealth Economic Conference have considered the form of the Royal Title.

They recognised that the present title is not in accord with current constitutional relations within the Commonwealth, and that there is need for a new form of title which will, in particular, reflect the special position of the Sovereign as head of the Commonwealth. They concluded, after full consideration, that in the present stage of development of the Commonwealth relationship, it would be in accord with the established constitutional position that each member country should use for its own purposes a form of title which suits its own particular circumstances but retains a substantial element which is common to all. They agreed that the various forms of the title should, in addition to an appropriate territorial designation, have as their common element the description of the Sovereign as Queen of Her Other Realms and Territories and Head of the Commonwealth.

The representatives of all the Commonwealth countries concerned have agreed to take, at the earliest convenient opportunity, such action as is necessary in each country to secure the appropriate constitutional approval for the changes now envisaged. Her Majesty will then be advised to exercise her prerogative power by the issue of proclamations giving effect to such changes in the title as may be recommended. It is contemplated that the proclamation will be issued simultaneously in all the countries concerned.

The form of title that will be recommended for use in Canada is:

“Elizabeth the Second, by the grace of God of the United Kingdom, Canada and her other realms and territories Queen, Head of the Commonwealth, Defender of the Faith.”

ROYAL STYLE AND TITLES

3. The Prime Minister referred to the announcement of December 12th concerning the agreement reached in London on the Royal Style and Titles. He proposed to table the communique in the House of Commons and to indicate that the government would recommend to Parliament that the matter be dealt with during the course of the present session.

It had become clear at an early point in the special meetings that no single form of title would be generally acceptable to all the countries concerned. The result, in which Canada would be associated in her form of title with Australia and New Zealand, seemed satisfactory. A principal point of discussion with the Prime Ministers of the latter two countries had been whether the three titles should refer simply to the “United Kingdom” or to the “United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland”. The full style would be used in the United Kingdom title. Mr. Churchill had felt that it would not be possible for the United Kingdom to leave out specific reference to Northern Ireland but he had no objection to the shorter version being used by others. It seemed much preferable not to have a formal declaration by the other countries in their titles that Northern Ireland was a part of the United Kingdom as this was likely to give rise to controversy. Australia and New Zealand had agreed with that view.

The South African title would describe the Queen as “Queen of South Africa and of her other realms and territories” but would not include mention of the United Kingdom nor the phrases “by the grace of God” or “Defender of the Faith”. The title of Ceylon would be similar. Pakistan would refer to the “United Kingdom” with no reference to Pakistan specifically. It seemed clear that the government of Pakistan felt it would ultimately have to follow the same course as India and recognize the Queen simply as head of the Commonwealth.

There might be some discussion about retention for Canada of the phrase “Defender of the Faith”. While in the United Kingdom it had a special connotation through the established church, for Canada it could properly be regarded as referring to the role of the state in protecting the freedom of religious observance and in defending the faiths accepted by her people.

4. The Cabinet:

(a) noted with approval the report of the Prime Minister concerning the agreement on the Royal Style and Titles to be used by the various countries of the Commonwealth; and,

(b) agreed that the final communique be tabled in the House of Commons with indication that action on the Canadian form of the title would be recommended to Parliament during the course of the present session.

[Ottawa,] January 9, 1952

OFFICE OF GOVERNOR GENERAL; RELINQUISHMENT BY LORD ALEXANDER; APPOINTMENT OF SUCCESSOR

40. The Prime Minister reported that Mr. Churchill had informed him that he wished to bring Lord Alexander into the United Kingdom Cabinet as Minister of Defence as soon as possible. Lord Alexander could hardly continue as Governor General while a Minister-designate. It had accordingly been indicated to Mr. Churchill that there should be no announcement of Lord Alexander's new post until his relinquishment of his present office and the appointment of a successor had been announced.

There was considerable support in Canada for appointment of a Canadian as the next Governor General and it was felt that the name of the Rt. Hon. Vincent Massey could suitably be submitted to the King. It might be necessary for the change to be made very shortly after Mr. Churchill's visit to Ottawa. Mr. Massey would not be able to take up his duties for some time and, in the meantime, it would be necessary to continue the allowances for the upkeep of Rideau Hall.

41. Mr. St. Laurent said that, with the concurrence of his colleagues, he would send a letter to the King through the Minister of Finance, who was going to London, informing His Majesty that the government had agreed that he should submit Mr. Massey's name for consideration for appointment as Governor General. He had suggested to Lord Alexander that he should inform the King of his desire to relinquish his present office and, as Prime Minister, he would advise the King that this desire should be acceded to. It would be necessary to have letters patent issue[d] terminating Lord Alexander's appointment. The Chief Justice would then become Administrator until Mr. Massey took office. Upon the King approving the appointment, an announcement regarding Lord Alexander's replacement by Mr. Massey could be issued immediately, making it clear that the latter would not be able to assume his duties for some time. There would be no objection to Mr. Churchill announcing thereafter Lord Alexander's new appointment.

Lord Alexander was agreeable to these various arrangements and prepared to remain in Canada until the announcements were made. There was reason to believe that Mr. Massey would accept the proposed appointment.

42. In the course of the ensuing discussion, it was noted that Canada was the only Commonwealth country with the possible exception of Ceylon that had not so far had one of its own citizens as its Governor General. The proposed change would not preclude the appointment of non-Canadians on later occasions. As Lord Alexander felt unable to remain for another term and no suitable successor appeared to be available in the United Kingdom, the present was an appropriate time to appoint a Canadian. Knowing Mr. Massey very well, the King would feel that he had a personal representative in Canada. The circumstances of Lord Alexander's departure should help to make the appointment of a Canadian understandable to those who had a preference for the office of Governor General being filled from the United Kingdom. While it was important that the announcement of Lord Alexander's new post be issued separately, it should follow very closely on the announcement of his replacement at Rideau Hall by Mr. Massey.

43. It was also noted that it would be necessary to inform Mr. Massey of the proposals before any communications were passed to the Palace and that these would not be delivered pending discussions with Mr. Churchill.

44. The Cabinet, after further discussion, approved the proposal of the Prime Minister that the name of the Rt. Hon. Vincent Massey be submitted to the King for consideration for appointment as Governor General of Canada to succeed Lord Alexander who would be relinquishing this office, and noted the steps that would be taken if the submission were approved.

Sir:

I present my humble duty to Your Majesty.

Mr. Churchill advised me that he had consulted Your Majesty about his desire to have Lord Alexander undertake the duties of Minister of Defence in the United Kingdom on the termination of his duties as Governor General of Canada, and that Your Majesty was willing to approve that proposal.

I expect to discuss with Mr. Churchill during his forthcoming visit to Ottawa what would be an appropriate date for making the formal submissions to Your Majesty.

I have already explained to Mr. Churchill in an exchange of telegrams that it would be embarrassing to have Lord Alexander relinquish the office of Governor General until I was in a position to submit to Your Majesty the name of a successor, and that it would be undesirable to have any announcement made that Lord Alexander is to become one of Your Majesty's Ministers in the United Kingdom until he has ceased to represent Your Majesty as Governor General of Canada.

I have now discussed with my colleagues the appointment of a successor to Lord Alexander as Governor General. They have concurred in my recommendation that I should submit to Your Majesty the name of the Right Honourable Vincent Massey in the hope that You would share our view that because of his distinguished public service over many years and his personal qualities Mr. Massey would be a fitting and distinguished Representative of Your Majesty in Canada. I have reason to believe that Mr. Massey would be honoured to accept the appointment.

If Your Majesty is pleased to approve the appointment of Mr. Massey, I would recommend that a public announcement be made simultaneously with the announcement of Lord Alexander's relinquishment of office.

As Mr. Churchill has indicated that he is anxious to have Lord Alexander's appointment as Minister of Defence take place at an early date, it may be desirable to have the change made in the fairly near future. I would assume that, at the appropriate time, Lord Alexander would inform Your Majesty of his desire to relinquish the office of Governor General of Canada and that I would advise, as Prime Minister that his desire should be acceded to, and recommend that Mr. Massey be appointed to succeed him. Upon approval by Your Majesty the announcement could be made. There could be no objection from the Canadian standpoint to an announcement by Mr. Churchill immediately thereafter of Lord Alexander's appointment as Minister of Defence.

I have shown this letter to His Excellency who is agreeable to the course suggested.

I should like to take advantage of this communication to say what a great satisfaction it was to the people of Canada to hear Your Majesty's voice on Christmas Day, not only for the message it brought, but because of what it meant after the grave illness of last year. Your Majesty's recovery has been the cause of heart-felt rejoicing by Canadians everywhere.

EXCHANGE OF DIPLOMATIC REPRESENTATIVES BETWEEN CANADA AND AUSTRIA

On a number of occasions since the end of 1947, latterly through the consular representatives in Ottawa (Dr. Frederick Riedl-Riedenstein, until October last Consul-General, and Baron Kurt F.J. Päumann, Honorary Vice-Consul and presently in charge of their Consulate General), the Austrian Government have raised the question of an exchange of diplomatic representation with Canada. In January of this year, following your agreement that we should accredit our Swiss representative to Vienna as soon as possible,<sup>9</sup> we informed Baron Päumann that we were ready to proceed in this way. We told him that within a year we might find it possible to appoint a junior officer to Vienna who would act on the instructions of Mr. Doré.<sup>10</sup> On March 11, Baron Päumann told us that his Government had agreed to this double accreditation.

Confusion then occurred when we were informed through our High Commissioner in London early in March that the Austrian Government wished to appoint Dr. W. Peinsipp as Consul General in Ottawa, which was difficult to reconcile with the agreement just reached for the exchange of diplomatic missions. Baron Päumann undertook to secure clarification from his Government.

On May 12, our High Commissioner<sup>11</sup> sent us a telegram stating the Austrian Ambassador had informed him the latter's government now wished to appoint Dr. Peinsipp as Austrian Chargé d'Affaires in Ottawa. In reply, we asked the High Commissioner to ascertain if it was intended that Dr. Peinsipp should be Chargé d'Affaires ad interim to which we would gladly agree, or Chargé d'Affaires en pied which would require further study on our part. Under date of June 10, the High Commissioner wired us that during an interview in which he explained our position to the Austrian Ambassador, the latter wondered whether we would object to receiving an Austrian Minister who was also accredited to another country on the understanding there would be a resident Chargé d'Affaires in Ottawa. The High Commissioner told him the only exception we had thus far made in favour of double accreditation was for countries which were members of the North Atlantic alliance, and that he did not think Luxembourg and Portugal constituted a precedent for receiving an Austrian Minister who was also accredited to United States.

These remarks of the Austrian Ambassador were apparently speculative and the High Commissioner thinks the Austrian Government eventually will simply designate Dr. Peinsipp as Chargé d'Affaires ad interim. There have been no further developments to date.

1. The Austrian Ambassador called this morning to repay my call upon him. He had not yet heard from Vienna whether his government would be agreeable to appointing Dr. Peinsipp to Ottawa as Chargé d'Affaires ad interim. It became clear, however, in the course of the conversation, that Dr. Wimmer himself hopes very much that his government may take seriously that they enquire whether the Canadian Government would be willing to have him, while remaining Ambassador in London, also accredited as Minister in Ottawa, with a Chargé d'Affaires ad interim resident there. You may, therefore, wish to consider this possibility more seriously than my telegram under reference suggested, so that if he is authorized to raise the question I can give him some indication of what the Canadian attitude would be.

2. As Mr. Wilgress will know, the present Austrian Ambassador in London is a very charming and intelligent man who should be very welcome in his own capacity whenever he could come to Canada.

OPENING OF A CANADIAN HIGH COMMISSIONER'S

OFFICE IN CEYLON

As a result of a conversation today with Mr. MacKay, this memorandum has been prepared covering, in brief, the past history of Canadian representation in Ceylon and giving reasons why this Division considers the appointment of a High Commissioner desirable.

2. At various times in the past, notably in February, 1948, and August, 1950, the Government of Ceylon enquired concerning the possibility of exchanges of representatives between Ceylon and Canada, and stated that the appointment of a Canadian High Commissioner or other representative of the Canadian Government would be welcomed.

3. In the various discussions which have taken place, the following points have been considered:

- A. (i) Appointment of a resident High Commissioner to Ceylon.
- (ii) Either our High Commissioner to India or our High Commissioner to Pakistan to also be accredited to Ceylon.

(Through Mr. MacKay)

B. (i) Either their High Commissioner in London or their Ambassador in Washington should also be accredited to Canada.

4. The Cabinet on May 6, 1948, decided against an extension of representation to Ceylon. In June, 1950, it was decided to appoint a Canadian Trade Commissioner to Colombo, who, in addition to his normal trade duties, would undertake duties for this Department under the Technical Assistance Programme of the Colombo Plan as well as certain consular duties. At a Cabinet meeting on June 19, 1952, the Minister mentioned that when changes in posting were considered, it was most desirable that the representative of Trade and Commerce in Ceylon should be a person who might adequately represent us in the Council of the Colombo Plan and, possibly be designated as Acting High Commissioner. The Cabinet noted with approval the Minister's remarks, consideration to be given at a later date to specific proposals.<sup>14</sup>

5. Arguments in Favour of Diplomatic Representation in Colombo

(i) Ceylon is the only member of the Commonwealth in which Canada is not represented by a High Commissioner. In addition, it might be mentioned that the United Kingdom, Australia, India and Pakistan all have High Commissioners in Colombo. The Ceylonese may not relish being treated as a second-class member of the Commonwealth.

(ii) We should support in every way the friendly attitude which the present Government takes towards a continuance of the Commonwealth connection.

(iii) The value of Ceylon's strategic position in the event of a general war is of interest to us.

(iv) The great increase in our trade with Ceylon during the past decade and the work arising out of the Bureau for Technical Co-operation in Colombo make it impossible for the Trade Commissioner to devote time to the preparation of political reports which we require from time to time. In addition, he has no cypher facilities and provisions for adequate security of documents are poor.

(v) If the Trade Commissioner is to attend to his Trade duties, and also wrestle with increasing work in connection with the Colombo Bureau, one or the other is bound to suffer.

(vi) From the point of view of prestige, the Trade Commissioner's rank in the order of precedence is naturally not very high, and aside from the normal difficulties attendant on such rank, it is an indirect reflection on Canada's world position.

6. Arguments Against Diplomatic Representation in Colombo

(i) Ceylon is a small country and is of little political importance. She is, however, one of our closest friends in Asia.

(ii) Our Trade Commissioner has reported that he receives full co-operation and support from the Government of Ceylon.

(iii) It appears that as recently as August, 1950, the Government of Ceylon did not think it possible to appoint a resident High Commissioner in Ottawa, but thought it necessary for their Ambassador in Washington to be also accredited to Ottawa.

7. Conclusion

This Division considers that the arguments in favour of the appointment of a Canadian High Commissioner to Ceylon are stronger than those against. The Ceylonese would welcome the appointment, although they may not be able to reciprocate in kind at this juncture. Our Trade Commissioner in Ceylon is obviously not able to cope with duties in the political field and appears to find the load of technical assistance and other duties under the Colombo Plan and his limited consular duties, superimposed as they are on his trade duties, to be a heavy one. We therefore recommend that consideration be given to the appointment of a resident High Commissioner in Colombo in the next fiscal year.<sup>15</sup>

CANADIAN CONSULATE GENERAL IN SHANGHAI

21. Mr. Norman. During the summer, it was decided to bring Dr. G.S. Patterson back from the Canadian Consulate General in Shanghai and if possible to send somebody out to take his place. A replacement was nominated and the Central People's Government of China was asked for an entry permit for him. This the Central People's Government of China has so far not granted and it now appears unlikely that any successor to Dr. Patterson can be sent. The Canadian Consulate General in Shanghai is, therefore, closing its offices on January 15 and three locally engaged staff are being attached to the United Kingdom Consulate General to work under a United Kingdom consular Officer for approximately three months until outstanding consular business has been cleared up. At the end of that time, Canada will be left only the Embassy property in Nanking in charge of two Chinese caretakers and will have no representation anywhere in Chinese territory.

FUTURE OF THE CANADIAN MILITARY MISSION IN BERLIN

At a meeting of the Working Group of the Establishment Board on October 17 the question of the future of the Canadian Military Mission in Berlin was informally discussed and referred to the Divisions concerned for their views. At that time it was thought probable that because the British intended to take their civilian employees off occupation costs and put them — with appropriate allowances — on the German economy, the staff of the Canadian Military Mission might have to be treated likewise and that this would involve an increase in the cost of maintaining the Mission. A later report suggested that the situation for British military personnel would be different; they would continue to receive normal military facilities, including housing and servants, as charges against occupation costs. Mr. Davis thought that our Mission in Berlin might be taken under the wing of the military authorities, in which case there would be no question of our receiving services at United Kingdom expense although we would receive them through the medium of the United Kingdom authorities. To date we have had no definite word from Bonn that this would in fact take place so that there remains some uncertainty about the future costs of operating the Mission.

2. The considerations outlined above led us to give thought in this Division to an assessment of the political value to us of the Military Mission, apart from considerations of staff and finance. To that end we wrote Mr. Davis on October 26 in the following terms:

“While, as we understand, the Berlin office serves some purpose on the consular side and on the intelligence side, the main consideration in deciding whether or not to continue it will be whether its value as a contribution to Allied solidarity in Berlin and as a source of political intelligence is sufficient, in Canadian terms, to justify the cost of maintaining it. Your assessment of the utility of the office on the basis of these broader political considerations will be helpful in reaching a decision.”

The consulate in Frankfurt was closed in 1952.

3. In a reply dated December 15, Mr. Davis informed us that Major-General Coleman, the British Commandant of Berlin, and his political adviser, were most anxious that the Military Mission should remain for the following reasons:

(a) The withdrawal of any one of the Western Military Missions from Berlin might cause similar action on the part of other missions;

(b) The withdrawal of even one mission would give the Soviet authorities, as well as their East German puppets and those of the satellite countries, a propaganda point which would doubtless be distorted in the usual manner;

(c) The presence in Berlin of as large as possible a number of missions from the Western Powers is of tremendous moral and psychological value to the citizens of Western Berlin; no matter how little material value any Military Mission might be to its government at home or to its own nationals in Germany, this moral and psychological value is not in the least diminished.

4. Mr. Davis gave it as his own view that the Military Mission should be kept open at least until a radical change takes place in the relations of the Federal Republic and Berlin with the West, when the position should be reconsidered. As to the value of Berlin as a source of political intelligence, he considered it inevitable that the material which would come from Berlin would be almost entirely military intelligence since our representation there is military. He was inclined to doubt whether the Department could or should afford political representation at a sufficiently high level there.

5. Our next step was to ask our Ambassadors in London, Paris and Washington to ascertain the views of the governments to which they are accredited. Replies have now been received from all three.

6. The State Department would view with some concern a decision on our part to close the Berlin Mission, chiefly for the reasons set out in paragraph 3 above. They took the line that the maintenance of military missions in Berlin provides evidence to Berliners that countries of the West, other than those of the Occupying Powers, would continue to lend their support to preserve the status quo. They pointed out that the legal status of missions in Berlin would not be affected by the proposed contractual relations and that the cost of maintaining these missions would not necessarily be substantially increased in the near future. They also made the suggestion that if the costs of maintaining the Canadian Military Mission were considered excessive, a Canadian Military Representative, perhaps residing in Bonn, might be accredited and be present in Berlin only when it was considered essential or desirable.

7. The French also agreed with the views of the British Commandant. They were insistent that our Mission remain in Berlin even if we reduced it to one representative who need not even live there but who could arrange to be present at all important functions in order that the name of Canada should continue to be in evidence.

8. The Foreign Office assured Canada House that, in answer to a similar enquiry from the South African Government, the United Kingdom authorities in both Wahnheide and Berlin had stated that they attached great importance to continued Commonwealth representation. In addition to giving general support to the views of the British Commandant in Berlin, the Foreign Office referred to the key importance which the tripartite powers have placed on Berlin in the General Agreement now being negotiated under which arrangements are being made to preserve the position of the Three Powers in this critical outpost. General Bishop of the Commonwealth Relations Office, who served in the Control Commission in Berlin and as Land Commissioner for North Rhine/Westphalia, was also consulted by Canada House and supported the Foreign Office's views.

9. We might add that Personnel Division have asked National Defence for a continuation of Captain O'Hagan's services with our Berlin Mission for another year, Finance Division have made provision in next year's Estimates for maintenance of the Mission, and Consular Division would like consular and immigration work there to continue.

10. After due consideration of the points set out in this memorandum we recommend that the Canadian Military Mission in Berlin be kept open. Its value as a source of political intelligence is perhaps not great, but we believe that the prestige of the West and the aid and comfort to the Berliners which the presence in their city of our Mission constitutes justify the continuance of Canadian representation in this outpost of the free world.<sup>17</sup>

"The Government of Canada, which has followed with admiration the achievement of the Government of Indonesia in establishing a new nation, recognizes the important role which the Republic of Indonesia is destined to play in world affairs. It also feels that great opportunities exist for the development of trade to the mutual advantage of Canada and Indonesia. Consequently, in order to create the closest possible political and economic ties between the two countries, the Government of Canada is happy to propose the exchange of diplomatic missions with the status of embassies.

If the Government of Indonesia finds this proposal acceptable, the Government of Canada would be prepared to establish a Canadian Embassy in Djakarta at an early date and wishes to request agrément for the appointment of Mr. George Robert Heasman as Ambassador of Canada to Indonesia.

The Government of Canada would be grateful for an indication by the Indonesian authorities of their readiness to grant such assistance as would be necessary in establishing a Canadian Embassy in Djakarta, and would reciprocally be happy to assist the Government of Indonesia in establishing its Embassy in Ottawa either in the near future or at such later date as best suits its convenience.”

2. It would be greatly appreciated if the United Kingdom Ambassador could report by telegram of the reaction of the Minister for Foreign Affairs.

6. The Secretary of State for External Affairs pointed out that the Canadian Liaison Mission in Tokyo was accredited to the Supreme Commander for the Allied Powers. With the coming into force of the Japanese Peace Treaty about April 1st, 1952, the S.C.A.P. organization would be disbanded. The relatively long period in which Canada had had diplomatic relations with Japan, the importance of Japan's position in the Far East and a Japanese desire to establish an embassy in Canada suggested that the Canadian post-treaty office in Tokyo should be an embassy. It also seemed reasonable that the present head of the Liaison Mission be nominated as Chargé d'Affaires a.i., pending appointment of an Ambassador.

APPOINTMENT; CANADIAN AMBASSADOR TO JAPAN

1. The Prime Minister, referring to discussion at the meeting of March 18th, said it was necessary to appoint an Ambassador to Japan. It was desirable that he should be familiar with the important matters involved in Canadian relations with Japan and also have an understanding of the attitude on the West Coast of Canada toward Japanese problems. The Minister of Fisheries, who had wished for some time to retire, had agreed to remain in the government until the end of the present Parliament. However, he would be particularly suitable for this appointment and, while not prepared to consider it for any long period, would be ready to serve for a year or so. The Queen's approval had been secured and it was recommended that Mr. Mayhew be appointed effective November 15th. The appointment would involve Mr. Mayhew's resignation from the government.

2. The Cabinet approved the recommendation of the Prime Minister and agreed that the Honourable R.W. Mayhew be appointed Canadian Ambassador to Japan effective November 15th, 1952; an Order in Council to be passed accordingly.

MEMORANDUM FOR MR. RITCHIE

As was anticipated, when the Spanish Consul-General, Dr. G. Baraibar, paid a courtesy call this morning, he referred to the desirability of the establishment of direct diplomatic relations between Ottawa and Madrid. In addition to making the usual argument about the opportunities which would be afforded for the development of closer relations between Canada and Spain by the establishment of direct channels of communication between the two governments, Dr. Baraibar went on to point out that Canada was the only North Atlantic Treaty country that did not have a diplomatic mission in the Spanish capital.

2. You will recall that toward the end of last year, the Spanish raised with us on three occasions the question of an exchange of diplomatic missions. General Vanier was authorized to inform the Spanish Ambassador in Paris that the question was being studied and that a considered reply would be forthcoming in due course. The subject was again raised in a memorandum to the Minister dated April 4th, which was initialled by Mr. Heeney but which would not appear to have reached Mr. Pearson. This memorandum is flagged on the attached file.†

3. I should be glad if you would let me know what further action, if any, you consider might be taken on this subject at this time.<sup>20</sup>

EXCHANGE OF DIPLOMATIC REPRESENTATION WITH SPAIN

The Minister's request that active consideration be given to the opening of a diplomatic office in Spain raises a number of questions relating to the timing of a proposed submission to Council, the nature of our representation in Madrid, and ancillary personnel and administrative problems.

2. On the question of timing, I am not aware of any serious political grounds which would make it inadvisable to go ahead with a submission to Council in the near future. Over the past few months, the press has reported the few incidents in Spain involving the desecration of Protestant churches. The Spanish Government, however, has not been implicated in any of these happenings, but has on the contrary incurred the wrath of Cardinal Segura, Archbishop of Seville, for being too tolerant in the face of Protestant proselytising. If there are complaints from Protestant quarters against the opening of an office in Madrid, we could point out that we are in a better position to make our views known to the Spanish Government once we have established diplomatic relations.

3. In considering the claims of other countries against those of Spain, it will be recalled that in the general review on the opening of new missions prepared last October, the Minister approved the proposal regarding the opening of a mission in "the Vatican or Spain" during the fiscal year 1952-53. As it is understood that the Government is not considering the opening of a mission at the Vatican for the time being, there seems to be no reason why the case of Spain should not be put up.

4. The question of the nature of our representation in Spain is rather more difficult. Two important political considerations in this respect are the wishes of the Spanish and the problem of "equating" our representation in Madrid and Lisbon. The aide-mémoire left with General Vanier last December by the Spanish Ambassador in Paris expressed the hope that Canada would exchange "Ambassadors or in any case Ministers". In various recent verbal representations, Spanish officials have likewise referred to an exchange of Ambassadors. Although we have been more and more inclined to minimize the distinction between embassy and legation, this is not the case in the Iberian Peninsula, and this fact, combined with Lisbon's traditional jealousy of Madrid would appear to make it necessary to consider carefully the results likely to flow from any given establishment in the Spanish capital. We understand from Mr. Glass,<sup>21</sup> for instance, that the appointment of a resident Canadian Ambassador in Spain would not go unnoticed by Portuguese officials who have already indicated that Canada's interests would be better served by having a resident Minister in Lisbon.

5. It was suggested to Mr. Glass that one way out of this difficulty might be to have a Minister (or Ambassador) accredited to both Lisbon and Madrid, the head of mission spending about the same amount of time on both sides of the Meseta. Mr. Glass, however, foresaw a number of difficulties in this suggested solution. It appears that South Africa has a representative accredited in the two Iberian capitals but that the Portuguese are so jealous of his trips to Spain that it has been impossible on occasion for him to fly to Southern France because this involved a stop-over in Barcelona. In addition to the difficulties which might be caused by this fantastic pettiness on the part of the Portuguese, there remains the important fact that we are not likely to have enough dealings with the Portuguese to justify the presence of a head of mission there for six months, while, on the contrary, our dealings with Spain may in the course of time come to assume considerable importance.

6. If we wish to placate the Portuguese, there would appear to be three possible courses of action open to us:

(a) A resident head of mission might be appointed to both Lisbon and Madrid. This would in effect almost double the cost of establishing a mission in Madrid (in view of the increased expenditure in Lisbon), and it would probably be difficult to justify full-scale representation in Portugal on any practical terms.

(b) A head of mission in a country other than Portugal (e.g. Italy) might be dually accredited to Madrid. This would more or less equate our representation in the two Iberian capitals, as it would accord with existing arrangements in Lisbon. However, the Spanish have indicated that they would not care for dual accreditation. Further it must be recognized that such an arrangement would involve leaving the Rome office for protracted periods without a head of mission. I also understand that as a general principle we do not favour the accreditation to Ottawa of foreign heads of mission in Washington, which would almost certainly be involved in any such solution.

(c) We might postpone the appointment of a head of mission to Madrid and place the office under a Chargé d'Affaires from this Department. Such an arrangement might possibly be acceptable to the Spanish and would probably not cause difficulties in Lisbon. It is doubtful, however, whether this could be more than a temporary way out, especially as it would in effect place our mission in Madrid on much the same basis as our mission in the USSR and the Satellites. While our relations with Spain can hardly be described as "cozy", we would, I think, be making a mistake if we gave the impression that in establishing diplomatic relations we wished to go no further than the formal minimum accorded to the Iron Curtain countries.

7. As none of these solutions is very attractive, it would perhaps be best to approach the Spanish problem independently of its Portuguese ramifications, realizing that a decision to open a mission in Madrid will undoubtedly complicate the already unsatisfactory situation in Lisbon.

8. This division is not in a position to advise on the administrative or financial aspects of the problem. . . .

You might therefore wish us to arrange for a meeting of representatives from the appropriate functional divisions, perhaps after Mr. Ritchie's return, at which the question of a submission to Council could be discussed.

EXCHANGE OF DIPLOMATIC REPRESENTATION WITH SPAIN

I am grateful to the European Division for the memorandum of August 27 on the above subject and for the very thoughtful appraisal of the various factors which have to be taken into account in connection with the exchange of Diplomatic representation with Spain.

2. The Minister has requested that we give active consideration to the opening of a Diplomatic Office in Spain, but with regard to the timing of a proposed submission to Council, this is subject to the following two factors:

(a) we first must make more progress in the setting up of new Diplomatic Missions for which authority has already been received from Council, e.g., Venezuela, Colombia, Indonesia and Ceylon;<sup>23</sup>

(b) the submission to Council must be made at a time when the Minister is in Ottawa for a period of at least two weeks at a time. So far as we can foresee, the only such period until the end of the year is likely to be from September 26 to October 14.

3. Acting upon the suggestion in paragraph 8 of the memorandum, I think it would be useful if Mr. Ritchie could convene a meeting of the appropriate functional Divisions, which meeting should also be attended by Mr. Macdonnell. At such a meeting it should be emphasized that the whole question is still very tentative and that the purpose of the meeting is exploratory, with a view to deciding the various factors which have to be taken into account before a submission to Council is prepared. I would like to have a report of this meeting before authorizing the preparation of a submission to Council to be considered during the period of September 26 to October 14.

4. With regard to the questions of substance raised in the memorandum I feel quite sure that the only type of representation which would satisfy the Spanish Government would be the opening of an Embassy in charge of a duly accredited Ambassador. Anything less would probably have a worse effect on Canadian-Spanish relations than doing nothing at all. This gives rise to the delicate question of how to avoid the susceptibilities of the Portuguese. Here again probably nothing less than a Legation in charge of a duly accredited Minister would satisfy the Portuguese Government. They made it clear that while they accept the present arrangement of dual accreditation, they would not wish this to continue indefinitely. It might be possible to get away with maintaining a Legation at Lisbon instead of an Embassy, simply because the present Mission is a Legation, but from the point of view of expense and personnel, it now makes little difference to us whether a Mission has the status of an Embassy or a Legation if we have to have a fully accredited Ambassador or Minister in the post. However, on balance I think it would be preferable not to raise the Mission at Lisbon to the status of an Embassy when we appoint a full time Diplomatic representative to be in charge of the post, but perhaps you could give further consideration as to what you think the attitude of the Portuguese Government would be on this question.

5. To sum up, the opening of a Diplomatic Mission in Madrid will involve not only the appointment of a full time Ambassador to that post, but also the appointment of at least a full time Minister to Lisbon. I think it is on this basis that the meeting to be called in accordance with paragraph 8 of your memorandum should consider tentatively the questions involved.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS; OPENING OF NEW MISSIONS IN AUSTRIA, CEYLON, INDONESIA AND SPAIN

36. The Secretary of State for External Affairs referring to discussion at the meetings of January 23rd<sup>24</sup> and June 19th, 1952,<sup>25</sup> sought authority to make preparations for the opening of new Canadian Missions in Austria, Ceylon, Indonesia and Spain.

An explanatory note had been circulated.

37. Mr. Pearson explained that it was intended to put the office in Austria under the supervision of a chargé d'affaires with the Canadian Minister to Switzerland accredited to that country. A High Commissioner to Ceylon would be appointed eventually with the main function of looking after Canadian interests under the Colombo Plan. The Indonesian Office would be small and was required primarily for trading purposes.

It was thought advisable to establish a Canadian office in Madrid as soon as possible as Spain was the only important European country to which Canada had not yet accredited diplomatic representatives. This was an anomalous situation which presented the further disadvantage of somewhat restricting the field of action of the Canadian Trade Commissioner who had been posted to Madrid some time ago. It was thought that Canadian interests might possibly have fared rather better in the case of Barcelona Traction if this matter had been handled directly by our own representatives rather than through the diplomatic offices of the United Kingdom.<sup>26</sup>

As a general rule, it was not proposed at this time to open any new offices unless such course of action appeared to be desirable in the interests of Canadian trade.

38. Mr. Pearson added that the Department of Trade and Commerce would soon close its Trade Commissioner Office at Los Angeles. As there were approximately 100,000 Canadians in and around Los Angeles and for other reasons, it was thought that Canada should establish a Consulate in that City upon the departure of the Canadian Trade Commissioner.

An explanatory note had been circulated.

39. The Cabinet, after discussion,

(a) approved in principle the opening of new Canadian Diplomatic Missions in Austria, Ceylon, Indonesia and Spain;

(b) agreed that a Canadian Consulate be established at Los Angeles upon the departure from that City of the Canadian Trade Commissioner; and

(c) authorized the Department of External affairs to increase its establishment accordingly and to provide in its estimates for the new offices.

ESTABLISHMENT OF CONSULATES IN SEATTLE AND LOS ANGELES

The need for establishing consular offices at Seattle and Los Angeles has been under study for some time and I have now reached the conclusions, subject to your approval, that we should proceed with the opening of Consulates in these two cities as soon as possible.

2. The Department of Trade and Commerce have decided to close their Trade Commissioner's office in Los Angeles as the volume of commercial work does not apparently warrant its continued maintenance and the greater part of their work has been on our behalf. There are many Canadians living in Southern California (more than 100,000 in Los Angeles County alone). In addition, a very large number of Canadian tourists, especially from the Western Provinces, are attracted to that area. The office accommodation now held by the Trade Commissioner is suitable for a Consulate and has the added advantage of being known as a Canadian office. Your colleague, Mr. Winters,<sup>27</sup> has expressed interest in keeping an office in Los Angeles to continue the activities of the Tourist Bureau. The United Kingdom Consulate General in Los Angeles have informed the Consulate General in San Francisco that they are unable to take on additional consular work for us when the Trade Commissioner's Office closes.

3. In Seattle, where we have had no Canadian Government Office since the Immigration Office closed, the volume of consular work is likely to be even heavier than in Los Angeles. The United Kingdom has recently elevated their Consulate in Seattle to a Consulate General and have informed us that they are not too happy about the fact that 40% of the Consulate General's activities are on Canada's behalf. Shipping and trade enquiries, tourist and information work, naval visits, immigration, passport and citizenship problems would all be handled by a consular post in Seattle.

4. Mr. Wrong and the interested divisions in this Department have all agreed on the necessity of opening Consulates in these two cities in the near future.

5. If these Consulates are to be opened in the coming fiscal year, it will be necessary to make provision for them in the Estimates. I should appreciate it,

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL

Rio de Janeiro, January 22, 1952

Dear Arnold [Heeney]:

I visited Montevideo on Wednesday, January 17, a date which was more convenient to the Uruguayan authorities than Friday, January 19, the date I had originally planned to go there. The Minister of Foreign Affairs was away on summer holidays and my appointment was arranged with the Under-Secretary, Dr. Eduardo Jimenez Arechaga, who is also the Acting Minister. Incidentally, the appointment was arranged through the Uruguayan Legation in Buenos Aires and I found on my arrival in Montevideo that no communication had been received from Dr. Luis Soto<sup>29</sup> although he assured both Sicotte<sup>30</sup> and me that he had sent an airmail letter to his government on or about November 16 last.

I saw the United Kingdom Ambassador before going to the Foreign Office and learned from him that one of the things which most disturbed the Uruguayans was our failure to open an office after taking preliminary steps in Montevideo, such as looking for living and office accommodation. Therefore, when talking to the Acting Minister, I reviewed in considerable detail the developments which led to the government's decision to postpone the opening of an office in Uruguay. I emphasized that our attitude was not different from that of 1946 when an exchange of diplomatic representation was first discussed with them and that as soon as we were in a position to expand our service in Latin America, Uruguay would have a place of priority.

I indicated that the present international situation, about which all democratic countries like Uruguay and Canada were becoming increasingly concerned, might result in Canadian offices being opened in certain areas where Canadian representation might produce benefits for both our countries. I thought it advisable to make known this possibility to avoid later misunderstanding if we should open in some European country before establishing an office in Uruguay. I told him also our plans for double accreditation in Portugal and of the difficulties we were experiencing because of staff shortages in appointing an Ambassador to Argentina. I spoke too of the increasing pressure upon Canada from countries where no Canadian diplomatic office now exists and who were anxious to exchange representatives with us.

After this full explanation of our position, I said that Mr. Pearson had asked me to visit Montevideo during my tour of Latin America, first, to reassure the Uruguayan Government that Canada was anxious to maintain and develop the good and friendly relations which had always existed between our two countries and to continue the cooperation which we had always extended one to the other in the international field and, second, to explore possibilities which might enable us to have an exchange of diplomatic representatives which both our countries desired. I mentioned that it had occurred to me personally that a formula of double accreditation such as Canada now had in certain European countries might be the solution. Dr. Arechaga replied that he was sure this would be an acceptable arrangement to his government. When I asked him to suggest a Head of Mission whose territory might also include Uruguay, he proposed our Ambassador to Argentina.

I was careful to make no reference to a permanent office under a Chargé d'Affaires being established in Montevideo. (You will recall that when I discussed the matter with George Heasman, he stated that Trade and Commerce would be prepared to assign a trade officer to Montevideo to be in charge of our office there during the absence of our Ambassador.) I asked what additional expenses would be involved for Canada, what would be the further responsibilities for our Ambassador to Argentina and what would be the increased demands on his time. Dr. Arechaga said that he could think of no additional expenses with the exception of the Ambassador's travelling costs when he visited Montevideo. The further responsibilities and the demands on his time would involve merely visiting Montevideo infrequently when some current item of business between our two countries required his presence in that city for discussions with the Uruguayan authorities. You can see, therefore, that there is little additional cost involved for us although we can expect, I am sure, the Uruguayans to press at some future date for the establishment of an office in their capital under a Chargé d'Affaires, if not for the appointment of a separate Head of Mission. However, there is no such request at this time and I think that these arrangements are highly satisfactory from our standpoint.

I made clear that as an official I was in no position to make any commitment on behalf of the Canadian Government but that I would, on my return to Ottawa, acquaint the Canadian Government with these recommendations and I had every reason to believe that it would be prepared to authorize the small additional cost which would be involved for our Department. On his side, he explained that he too would have to put the matter formally before his government but he was reasonably certain it would be approved and that he would communicate such approval to our Chargé d'Affaires in Buenos Aires. In view of Soto's neglect in arranging my appointment, I considered this to be much the best channel to follow. It is probable that you will be hearing from Roy<sup>31</sup> before my return to Ottawa and can then initiate the necessary steps.

Yours sincerely,

HERB [MORAN]

DIPLOMATIC REPRESENTATION; . . . AUSTRIA, URUGUAY, VENEZUELA AND COLOMBIA

49. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said it was proposed to . . . arrange for Mr. Victor Doré, Minister to Switzerland, to be accredited also as Minister to Austria. For the present, the last merely involved extending Mr. Dore's territory, although later it might be found desirable to establish a small office in Vienna under a junior officer acting as chargé d'affaires.

He mentioned also that Uruguay had become so sensitive, as a result of Canada's failure to open an office in Montevideo, that it had withdrawn its Minister from Ottawa and, what was of real importance, was making difficulties for Canadian exports in a market of some consequence to Canada. As a result, the Department of Trade and Commerce had received complaints from Canadian exporters. It therefore appeared desirable to arrange for the next Ambassador to Argentina to be accredited to Uruguay as well, without for the present opening an office in Montevideo. It was understood that the Uruguayan government was likely to accept this solution for the present, although it might later become necessary to agree to establish an office there either under an officer from External Affairs or from the Trade Commissioner service.

Similarly, Venezuela and Colombia were upset about Canada's delay in agreeing to exchange diplomatic missions and, in consequence, the Canadian trade position was suffering. These countries were two of Canada's most important markets in Latin America and, as was true of Uruguay, Canadian trade rather than political interests called for diplomatic representation. In these circumstances, and since Venezuela and Colombia would not accept one Ambassador between the two countries, it was proposed to raise the Consulate General in Venezuela to an Embassy, and probably appoint the present Consul

General as Ambassador (without adding to the staff for the present at least), establish an Embassy also in Colombia and select an Ambassador for this post later in the year. The change in Venezuela would entail little new expenditure; that in Colombia would require limited additional annual expenditures in the neighbourhood of $50,000.

50. The Minister of Trade and Commerce agreed that important commercial interests in the three Latin American countries mentioned were suffering as a result of the lack of Canadian diplomatic representation and the changes proposed by Mr. Pearson were desirable for trade reasons. He felt it might also be necessary to establish a trade commissioner in Uruguay in the near future.

51. The Prime Minister said he had received representations from an Austrian source that Canada should provide some form of recognition of that country's existence and its desire to remain outside the Soviet orbit. If trade interests made necessary the action proposed with regard to Uruguay, Venezuela and Colombia, there appeared to be no alternative open to the government.

52. The Cabinet, after further discussion, approved the recommendations of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and:

1. agreed that:

(b) Mr. Victor Doré, Minister to Switzerland, be appointed also Minister to Austria;

(c) the next Ambassador to Argentina be appointed also Ambassador to Uruguay;

(d) representation in Venezuela be raised to the status of an Embassy;

(e) an Embassy be established in Colombia; and,

2. noted that offices would not be established in Austria or Uruguay without further consideration.

to Acting Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs*

CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa,] May 26, 1952

The position as regards the opening of new Missions in Latin America, according to the information available to me, appears to be as follows:

(a) I gathered from Mr. Moran that Uruguay as well as Venezuela<sup>32</sup> and Colombia would be satisfied of dual representation. As regards Uruguay, this fits in with the decision taken by Cabinet.

(b) Cabinet has agreed, in January, that consideration be given to the opening of Embassies in Venezuela and Colombia. This is at variance with the discussions held by Mr. Moran while he was in Bogota and Caracas.

(c) We are including in the supplementary estimates a global sum which could be used this fiscal year for the opening of those three Missions.

2. The decision as regards Uruguay is easy; the Government of Uruguay<sup>33</sup> is agreeable to dual representation; the Department of Trade and Commerce appears to be willing to supply an officer to act as Chargé d'Affaires in Montevideo; Cabinet decision is on the basis of double accreditation.

3. The only action to be taken here would be to come to a final understanding with the Department of Trade and Commerce, if this has not yet been done and, advise the Uruguayan authorities that Major-General LaFlèche will also be Minister or Ambassador to Uruguay.

4. Since Uruguay has always had a priority over Venezuela and Colombia as regards a commitment from the Canadian Government, I would recommend that action be taken as soon as possible. We would then be in a better position to cope with the problems of Venezuela and Colombia.

5. These two countries seem to be more or less on the same footing and what is done for one should be done for the other. It seems to be difficult to consider the appointment of Ambassadors although we can no longer argue that it is because of the lack of funds. There is the Cabinet directive of January which will remain operative until it is reversed and I presume that it is not the intention of the Department to have it reversed. Therefore, some progress should be made; otherwise, we might be open to criticism.

6. A further complication is the fact that it would be rather odd to appoint a Chargé d'Affaires only in Montevideo and to send Ambassadors to Caracas and Bogota. I am wondering if the following suggestion, coupled with that already made as regards Uruguay, would not meet the situation at least for some time:

7. That the Governments of Venezuela and Colombia be advised in the near future of our intention to open Embassies in those countries and be told, at the same time, that because of the lack of personnel available for appointment to the rank of Ambassador, the Missions will be in the charge of Chargé d'Affaires for some time. I realize that this is but a half-way measure and that it would be much more satisfactory if Ambassadors were appointed from the start; still it would meet our immediate requirements and partly solve the problem for the next year and a half or two.

Question of dual represent[ation] was never raised with Venezuela. [H.O. Moran]

Uruguay will expect same treatment as Colombia. [H.O. Moran]

8. I already referred to the fact that consideration was being given to appointing a Trade and Commerce officer as Chargé d'Affaires in Uruguay. The temptation is great to follow a similar pattern in Colombia and Venezuela. It would be less of a strain on our personnel and possibly also on our finances. I have come to the conclusion, however, that this should be resisted and that the Department should assume full responsibility for the new offices to be established in Caracas and Bogota.<sup>34</sup> We would be creating a very dangerous precedent indeed if we agreed to rely on the Department of Trade and Commerce to open and take over from the start three of our Missions in Latin America. Not only would we partly lose control over those Missions but we would be agreeing to a form of representation which is not necessarily in the best interests of Canada. Frankly, I am rather worried by the recent trends whereby more and more<sup>35</sup> of our consular posts are being handed over to the Department of Trade and Commerce.<sup>36</sup> If this trend were now to develop also in our Latin American Missions, I can foresee endless difficulties.<sup>37</sup>

9. There are in my opinion Foreign Service Officers<sup>38</sup> that are well qualified to be appointed as Chargé d'Affaires to Caracas and Bogota; if a Foreign Service Officer 3, 4 or 5 is considered a satisfactory candidate to become Chargé d'Affaires in Poland or for that matter Moscow, there is no reason why appointments from the same ranks could not be made in those two new Latin American Missions. I realize that it is generally agreed that the emphasis should be placed on trade in our Missions in Latin America; even trade, however, will not necessarily be better served by a Trade commissioner acting as Chargé d'Affaires than by a Foreign Service Officer in the same capacity, assisted by a Commercial Secretary.

10. I hope that some action can be taken on this matter after Mr. Moran's return. You may wish to call a meeting before Mr. Wilgress arrives so that plans could be submitted for his consideration. Mr. Howe's trip to Latin America in the autumn is an additional reason why this should be done.

URUGUAY; OPENING OF CANADIAN DIPLOMATIC MISSION

55. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to discussion at the meeting of January 23rd, 1952, said that, in view of the appointment in the near future of Canadian Ambassadors to Venezuela and Colombia, it was desirable at this time to accredit the Canadian Ambassador to Argentina as Ambassador to Uruguay and at the same time to open a small Canadian Mission at Montevideo which would be under the supervision of a foreign service officer as chargé d'affaires. The Department of Trade and Commerce also proposed to post a foreign service trade officer at Montevideo as soon as a suitable transfer could be arranged. It was thought advisable that the new Mission be opened by December 15th prior to the forthcoming Latin-American tour of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.<sup>39</sup>

An explanatory note had been circulated.

Ottawa, [September 25, 1952]

I have the honour to inform you that the Government of Canada is now in a position to open a diplomatic mission in Montevideo. You are, I know, aware of the various factors which have earlier prevented the Government of Canada from reciprocating the action taken some time ago by the Government of Uruguay in establishing its Legation in Ottawa.

In view of the importance of hemispheric relationships, and the desirability of strengthening the links between two democratic nations which are members of the free world, the Government of Canada feels it appropriate to propose that the diplomatic missions exchanged have the status of Embassy.

Would you, therefore, seek your Government's approval of the establishment in the immediate future of an Embassy of Canada in Montevideo and the elevation of your Legation in Ottawa to the status of Embassy.

If this proposal meets with the approval of your Government, the Canadian Government wishes to request the agrément of the Government of Uruguay for the appointment of Major General the Honourable Léo Richer LaFlèche, D.S.O., as Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of Canada to Uruguay. It is intended that Major General LaFlèche would continue also in his present capacity as Ambassador of Canada to Argentina and during his absence from Montevideo, the Embassy of Canada would be in the charge of a Chargé d'Affaires ad interim. I attach for the information of your Government biographical data concerning Major General LaFlèche.

It is assumed that your Government will wish to have announcement made simultaneously in Montevideo and Ottawa concerning this significant step in diplomatic relations between our two countries and that until agreement has been reached on a mutually convenient date, this matter will be treated as confidential.

I look forward to hearing from you of your Government's answer to these proposals.

Accept, Sir, etc.

EXCHANGE OF DIPLOMATIC REPRESENTATION WITH VENEZUELA

Cabinet authorization has been obtained for the exchange of diplomatic missions with Venezuela. It would be appreciated if you would approach the Venezuelan Ambassador at Washington and request that he inform his Government that the Canadian Government is now in a position to proceed with this long-desired exchange. A formal note to this effect should be given to him, stating that we wish to take immediate steps to open an Embassy in Caracas and would welcome the reciprocal establishment by the Venezuelan Government of an Embassy in Ottawa. It is assumed that the Venezuelan Government would wish to have the announcement of this important development made simultaneously in Ottawa and Caracas and that in the meantime the matter will remain confidential. We should be glad to learn of the announcement date which would be convenient to the Venezuelan authorities.

2. Please further inform the Venezuelan Ambassador that should his Government agree to the exchange of Embassies, you have instructions to request agrément for the appointment of Mr. Henry Gordon Norman, C.M.G., as Ambassador of Canada to Venezuela. Two copies of a curriculum vitae of the proposed appointee are attached.†

[Ottawa,] December 1, 1952

Memorandum for Mr. MacKay

ACCEPTANCE BY THE GOVERNMENT OF URUGUAY
OF OUR PROPOSAL TO EXCHANGE DIPLOMATIC MISSIONS

This morning Mr. Luis Soto, Chargé d'Affaires of the Uruguayan Legation, called upon Mr. Stark of this Division, to show him the Spanish text of the telegram the former had received from the Ministry of External Affairs in Montevideo, concerning the exchange of diplomatic missions between the two countries.

2. In brief the message stated:

1) The Uruguayan Government accepts the Canadian proposals for an exchange of Embassies and the appointment of General LaFlèche as Ambassador.

2) The Uruguayan Government agrees to simultaneous press releases in Montevideo and Ottawa, the date to be suggested by the Canadian Government.

3. After consultation with Mr. Macdonnell and Mr. Feaver, it was decided that Thursday, December 4 would be a convenient date for the press release. Mr. Soto is informing his Government by telegraph and we have passed word to the Press Office who will put out the Canadian release around 10:30 a.m. on Thursday, December 4, thus in time for the afternoon editions.

4. The message from the Uruguayan Foreign Ministry also informed Mr. Soto that, although he could make the above arrangements, the Senate of Uruguay must approve the executive order regarding the exchange of embassies and therefore General LaFlèche will not be able to present his Letter of Credence until the Senate acts. Mr. Soto suggested that General LaFlèche should talk with the Uruguayan Ambassador in Buenos Aires, Mr. Castro, and request him to obtain information from the Uruguayan Foreign Office as to a suitable date for the credentials ceremony.

5. This last information was conveyed to Mr. Gill and, as Mr. Morin is on the verge of departure from Rio it was agreed that Protocol Division, in consultation with us and Personnel, would send a telegram to Buenos Aires telling our Ambassador of the above, requesting him to get in touch at once with the Uruguayan Ambassador and to inform us, tomorrow if possible, whether Mr. Castro thought the Senate action might be long delayed. This telegram was repeated to Rio, and Buenos Aires was also asked to repeat its answer there for Mr. Morin's information.

6. Mr. Soto will send a formal note to the Department concerning acceptance of our proposals. He gave no reason at all for the long delay in the reply to our original note.

7. Mr. Macdonnell stated he would convey the information of Uruguay's acceptance of our proposals to the Under-Secretary.

Tokyo, May 22, 1952

VIOLATION OF THE YALU RIVER (MANCHURIAN BORDER)

Attached are copies of two reports dated May 17 and May 20, written by the Air Attaché, Group Captain R.W. McNair, D.S.O., D.F.C., concerning violation of the Yalu River (Manchurian Border).†

2. The first information, evaluated at about the lowest level of reliability, was obtained from a young USAF fighter pilot who had had a few too many drinks. G/C McNair discussed this report with me and said he would try to check the information. Fortunately, one of the three RCAF fighter pilots attached to USAF F86 Jet Squadrons in Korea came in and gave the further information in the second report.

3. G/C McNair tells me that these border crossings were not individual instances of short extensions of flights over the border by lone pilots. He says that the crossings have been made in organized formations penetrating ten to fifteen minutes' flying time over the border in aircraft flying 500 miles an hour.

4. G/C McNair has pointed out the serious implications of these reports. They reveal an irresponsible disregard at the Group level or higher in the USAF for U.S. undertakings that U.N. Command planes would not cross the Chinese border except in very special circumstances. The special circumstance discussed was the possibility that a large-scale Chinese air raid might be brought down on U.N. positions in Korea, making it militarily desirable to strike back before consultation with other U.N. contributors could be arranged. This circumstance has not existed in this case and there is considerable military doubt as to the actual value of these fighter sorties over Manchuria. This is borne out by the information contained in the second report which states that orders have recently been issued that pilots should not fly north of a line somewhat south of the Yalu River, in the hope that CCAF planes would fly south again in sizeable formations. It is serious that these border crossings should have been taking place about the time that the Panmunjom military armistice talks were being brought to a head. It is rather ominous that the Chinese have said nothing about these border crossings. They may have been waiting to shoot down a plane to get actual proof. If that plane had had a RCAF pilot in it, it would have been embarrassing for Canada.

5. I thought that I should draw these reports to your attention. Since orders have apparently now been issued that the border should not be crossed in some groups, you may wish simply to leave the matter for the time being. You will appreciate, I am sure, the necessity for handling this information with great delicacy lest the Canadian pilots who are getting most valuable jet operational experience in Korea should have their position questioned and lest it be suspected by the USAF that G/C McNair is the source of this information and they decide to freeze him out of contact with USAF personnel. I consider it most important that neither the position of our pilots nor that of G/C McNair should be in any way prejudiced in the handling of this information.

6. I should be grateful if you would let me know in due course the consideration given to this report in the Department and what, if any, action is taken.

Ottawa, May 29, 1952

Dear Hume [Wrong],

I enclose a copy of letter No. 576 of May 22 from Mr. Menzies in Tokyo, which transmits two reports which give good grounds for suspecting that at some level there has been a decision to ignore the restrictions which have been placed on air operations in Korea. The State Department would, I am sure, be as concerned as we are about these reports.

As you will see, the Air Attaché in Tokyo has obtained two reports of organized flights by fighter aircraft across the Yalu, possibly as far as Mukden. It is also his opinion that these activities are not known at United Nations Command Headquarters; presumably they are not known in Washington either. The flights appear to be the result of excessive zeal on the part of local commanders, but they are no less dangerous on that account. They have also apparently been halted for the moment, but if the decision to initiate them was taken on a relatively low level the first time, it may be taken there again unless something is done to make sure that the course of action agreed between the United States and its allies is followed on the lower echelons as well as higher up. I am sure that these considerations will appeal to the State Department.

I will leave it to your judgment how to convey this information to the State Department. While it seems to us to be another disturbing development in Korea, naturally great care will have to be taken to protect Mr. Menzies' sources in referring to it. For this reason you may not be able to state how we came by our information, asking those concerned in Washington to accept our assurances it is of a nature which gives reasonable grounds for suspicion.

Yours sincerely,

TOP SECRET

Washington, June 5, 1952

Dear Mike [Pearson],

Your letter of May 29th, enclosing a copy of Letter No. 576 of May 22nd from Mr. Menzies in Tokyo, raised a matter with which it is not at all easy to deal. I was most doubtful that the State Department would find it possible to take up with the Department of Defense the reports of deliberate and repeated flights into Manchuria by fighter-planes unless the sources of the reports were given; an assertion that the Canadian authorities had received enough information to give reasonable cause for suspicion that the reports were true would not be enough to satisfy them that the long and painful process of investigation should be undertaken. I took the opportunity of a visit to Washington by General Foulkes to discuss the matter with him and to ask whether he could suggest a Service channel which might be employed. He was not able to do this, but he felt strongly that the sources of our information ought to be protected, as an indication of them might prejudice the exchange of information in other contexts.

Finally, I decided that the best method of approach was to talk to Mr. Hickerson, making it clear that I was transmitting a report which, if true, would be of concern to the State Department because it meant that there had been deliberate violation by units of the U.S. Air Force of the agreed policy of the United Nations Command. As the first of the two reports from the Air Attaché in Tokyo gave as its source an unidentified U.S.A.F. fighter pilot, I decided to reveal its contents to him, telling him that a Canadian had overheard his statements when he was on leave in Japan and had reported them to the Canadian Embassy, but adding that some further confirmatory information had later been received.

Following my conversation with Mr. Hickerson, he talked the matter over with Mr. Freeman Matthews and asked me to see him again. He said that the information given was of too uncertain a quality for the State Department to accept it as true. All that they could do on receipt of a report such as this was to discuss the matter with General Bradley, and they did not feel in a position to approach General Bradley without further action on our part.

Could we, for instance, make available confirmatory information from a source or sources more trustworthy than an intoxicated pilot on leave? He added that Mr. Matthews and he presumed that we did have more convincing evidence, since otherwise we would not have taken the matter up with the State Department. I told him that such was the case, but that I was not at liberty to reveal where it came from; he could, however, be assured that it completely supported what the U.S.A.F. pilot had said. He remarked that if we were able to make this available, the State Department should then be in a position to approach General Bradley. General Bradley then would presumably telegraph to General Clark and an investigation would be put in train. (General Foulkes and I both doubt whether much would result if this were to be done. Standing orders to refrain from crossing the Yalu River would be cited as evidence that our information was unfounded and the matter might not penetrate down to the squadron or wing level at which the violations, if they in fact occurred, have originated.)

Mr. Hickerson said, as an alternative course, that if I informed the State Department in writing of the nature of the charges, saying that the evidence in support of them in your judgment gave good grounds for suspecting that systematic violations of Manchurian territory had in fact occurred, they would then feel able to take the matter up with General Bradley as in effect constituting a request from the Canadian Government (even if it were not put that way) that an investigation should be undertaken. I told him that I was unwilling to do this until you had given the matter further consideration. I doubt that this course also would get us much further.

The results of this discussion were pretty much what I had expected. The basic circumstance is the allegation that there has been a very serious violation of discipline, at any rate at wing or squadron levels, by the U.S. Air Force in the Far East. My conversation yesterday was the first intimation received by the State Department that this might be the case; I should think that the senior military authorities in the Pentagon are equally unaware of the reports, and also in all probability the senior military authorities in Tokyo. It is asking a good deal to expect them to start an investigation from the top, which might well end in courts-martial, without giving them a really well-documented case. This I cannot do and at the same time protect Mr. Menzies' sources. The really convincing report that we have received is that recording the questioning by Group Captain McNair of Flying Officer Nixon of the R.C.A.F., but this report cannot be passed on without damaging results. Incidentally, the only Canadian in Tokyo whom I have named is Mr. Menzies, and all I said about him was that some Canadians in Tokyo who had heard these stories had brought them to the notice of the Canadian Embassy; he had naturally thought it wise to report them to Ottawa.

Unless I pursue the matter further, the State Department does not intend to take any action and no record of my conversation has been made there. The State Department is, of course, alive to the dangers if the reports are true.

I think that this business reveals again that the arrangements in Tokyo for liaison with the U.N. Command H.Q. are defective. It should certainly be easier to get to the bottom of a story such as this if it could be effectively taken up there through a military channel.

Yours sincerely,

Ottawa, June 10, 1952

Dear Hume [Wrong],

I have just received your letter of June 5 regarding mine of May 29 which dealt with certain information from Menzies in Tokyo about our operations in Korea.

I agree with you that this involves a difficult and delicate problem of communication with the authorities in Washington and that we should be very careful not only to not give away our sources, but also not to put ourselves too firmly or officially behind the information. I think that, in the circumstances, you would be wise in not pursuing the matter further now that you have discussed it informally with Jack Hickerson. My own feeling is that it would be unwise, certainly at this time, to put anything officially in writing. I agree also with the conclusion of your last paragraph that liaison arrangements in Tokyo with the U.N. High Command are certainly defective.

Yours sincerely,

Dear Norman [Robertson],

We have already sent you copies of letter No. 576 of May 22 from Arthur Menzies in Tokyo. On May 29 I wrote to Hume Wrong asking him to take the matter up with the State Department. He replied on June 5 to the effect that we should not be able to get anywhere unless we put our views in writing or revealed the source of our information. I have told him that I think it would be unwise to put anything in writing officially at present. I think it would be useful if you would try to find out if the United Kingdom authorities have any similar information. I am sure that they will appreciate the need to be very careful of the source. Copies of my letters to Hume dated May 29 and June 10 and Hume's letter to me dated June 5 are attached.

Yours sincerely,

TOP SECRET AND PERSONAL

London, June 26, 1952

Dear Mike [Pearson]:

I had a talk today with R.H. Scott, of the Foreign Office, about your top secret letter regarding information received from Arthur Menzies about air flights across the Korean border. He said the question had only once come to his attention, and that was at a rather late night session in Seoul when most of Lord Alexander's party had gone to bed, and he (Scott) had stayed up for a while with General Bridgeford, who is the senior Commonwealth officer in Japan, A/V/M Boucher, the United Kingdom liaison officer in Korea, Arthur Menzies and Selwyn Lloyd. Menzies had brought up the subject in this very limited company in guarded and general terms. Boucher said that he had formed, perhaps from the same sources, an impression very similar to that reported by Menzies. General Bridgeford, who Scott described as a shrewd, level-headed, pretty moderate-minded Australian, disagreed completely with Menzies and Boucher, and thought there could be no real foundation to the reports which had reached them. His main argument had been that the Chinese would certainly have advertised and exploited any organized or recurring U.N. air activity north of the Korean boundary. Scott said the discussion was pretty heated and the disagreement complete. He himself did not feel that the facts of the case had really been established in the discussion to which he had listened; he was, I think, impressed by Bridgeford's argument.

He recalled Boucher saying that he had reported to the C.A.S. the rumours which had reached him, but said that the Foreign Office had not received any information from the Air Ministry on the subject.

Scott will have a word with Selwyn Lloyd and with Sir John Slessor and let me know what the United Kingdom appreciation of the position is.

Yours sincerely,

LETTER Y489

TOP SECRET. CANADIAN EYES ONLY.

ALLEGED VIOLATION OF THE CHINESE BORDER

Reference: Your Letter No. 576 of May 22.

The need to safeguard the sources of the information contained in the attachments to your letter under reference made it very difficult for us to use the information to the full. It was decided, however, that the charges implicit in the reports received by the Air Attaché were of sufficient gravity to warrant the taking of some risk.

2. Accordingly, on May 29, the Minister himself wrote a personal letter to the Canadian Ambassador in Washington enclosing a copy of your letter No. 576 and its attachments and asked him to take the matter up with the State Department on an informal basis. I attach a copy of this letter. You will see from Mr. Wrong's reply of June 5, which is also attached, that no progress was possible in Washington. The Minister concurred in this view in a letter dated June 10, copy attached.

3. It was then decided to see whether the United Kingdom had any similar information and the attached letter of June 16 was sent to the Canadian High Commissioner in London. He replied on July 5 that discussions with the Foreign Office had also come to a dead end. I attach a copy of this letter and its enclosure.

4. The matter is, therefore, being dropped for the time being. If, however, any further information should come to light, I should be grateful if you would let me know. I think you will agree that nothing has been done which would have any harmful effects on your Air Attaché or his informants.

MOVEMENT OF CANADIAN COMPANY TO KOJE ISLAND

This will confirm my telephone messages.

2. General Foulkes informed Mr. Claxton this afternoon that the Commonwealth Division in Korea had been ordered to provide two Companies for Koje Island and that one Canadian company and one United Kingdom Company had been chosen.

3. Mr. Claxton asked me to request you to tell the United States that we did not like this proposal. He thought that we could base our position on the fact that we had acceded to the 1929 Prisoners of War Convention and the United States had not. Both countries have, however, ratified the Convention.

4. I discussed this matter with the Prime Minister and he instructed me to request you to get in touch immediately with Mr. Acheson in an effort to have the order to the Canadian Brigade countermanded. You should inform Mr. Acheson that in the Prime Minister's opinion it would be more difficult to have our people agree to any additional contribution that may be required of them in Korea if a Canadian Company were to be sent to help guard the Koje Island prison camp. It was, therefore, in his opinion, in the general interests of the United Nations that the Canadians should not be asked to do this. The Prime Minister was thinking, for example, of the possibility of a renewed offensive and a request for more Canadian forces. He added that he did not want the order to the Canadians countermanded if it would gravely affect the morale of United States forces in Korea or discredit the new Commander-in-Chief.

5. After speaking to you I informed General Foulkes. He said that so far as he knew, Mr. Claxton had not sent any message to London as you thought he might have done. General Foulkes said that there was nothing which he could do through military channels. He added that it would probably not take any more than twenty-four hours for a Canadian Company to be moved from the front line to Kojé Island.

6. After speaking to you I telephoned the Prime Minister to tell him that Mr. Pearson had been in touch with you and had suggested that we wait until we hear what the United Kingdom is doing. I also told the Prime Minister that since speaking to him I had learned that a United Kingdom Company, as well as a Canadian company, had been ordered to Kojé. The Prime Minister said that if there were at Kojé a United Kingdom Company, as well as a Canadian Company, this would make some difference but it would not completely remove the embarrassment which might result. He feared that it might result in quite a reversal of feeling in Canada about our participation in the Korean war. There was a lot of anxiety in Canada about what has taken place at Kojé Island, and regardless of what the Government did, the sending of a Canadian Company to Kojé might have a considerable affect on opinion.

1. This message confirms my telephone conversations with Reid.
2. I discussed the question with Sir Christopher Steel[e] of the British Embassy this morning. He had not yet heard anything from London, but he fully shared the attitude of the Canadian Government and was sure that it would be completely supported by the British Government. He volunteered to speak on these lines at once to Matthews on his own responsibility.
3. Alexis Johnson, Deputy Assistant Secretary for Far Eastern Affairs, telephoned me shortly afterwards. He told me that forces from several other countries have served and are now serving on Kojé, including the Dutch battalion and some small units attached to United States formations that are engaged in guarding prisoners of war. There are now some 14,000 United States troops on this duty. In the effort to rectify the situation on Kojé, troops were being moved there from all over the theatre, including the United States airborne regiment from Japan. The matter was regarded here as purely a military question, within the authority of the United Nations Commander, and they were therefore loath to interfere from Washington.
4. After commenting that two companies from the Commonwealth Division could not make a great deal of difference in the outcome and presumably two additional United States companies could be found, I vigorously challenged the argument that the matter was purely military. I said that the fact that the Canadian Government had made representations at the highest available level (in view of Mr. Acheson's departure for Europe) made it a political matter as well. I mentioned the traditional opposition of Canada to any break-up of its forces overseas without prior governmental consent and that the State Department would probably receive almost immediately similar representations from the British Government. I said there would be considerable irritation in Ottawa if the only answer to our representations was "non possumus". I also told him of the Reuters despatch in today's Canadian papers from Tokyo and said that questions in the Canadian House were likely this afternoon.

5. I concluded by saying that the matter could not be left without some further reply. I read him the statement of the Prime Minister's views included in paragraphs 4 and 6 of your EX-1155. He agreed to have further discussions in the State Department as soon as possible.

I asked Mr. Bliss to come to see me and I put before him the considerations which you had put before the State Department. As you had expected, Mr. Bliss was receptive. He was impressed by the importance of the considerations which we had put forward. He agreed that the matter should not be considered as purely military.

2. I explained that the statement which had been drafted for use if necessary in the House of Commons had been deliberately put in language likely to cause the least embarrassment to the United States Government and arouse the least controversy in Canada. Mr. Bliss commented that our traditional desire to maintain our Force as an entity was one which was easily understandable by Americans in view of the line taken by General Pershing in the First War. Mr. Bliss said that he would immediately get in touch with Freeman Matthews in order to assist in ensuring that the matter was put before the Pentagon in a manner best calculated to secure sympathetic reception by the Pentagon. ## MOVEMENT OF CANADIAN COMPANY TO KOJE ISLAND

Reference: Your EX-1168 of May 23.

1. As soon as I arrived at a reception late yesterday afternoon given by General and Mrs. Bradley for General and Mrs. Ridgway, Mr. Foster, Deputy Secretary of Defense, took me into a corner to discuss our representations against the movement of the Canadian Company. He expressed strong personal sympathy with the Canadian point of view, but said the matter had been considered carefully at the Pentagon yesterday afternoon and that the Joint Chiefs of Staff had discussed it at some length. He thought I had better hear the results from General Bradley.

2. General Bradley told us that the movement to Kojé had advanced too far for it to be cancelled without causing grave military embarrassment. He understood that the units from the Commonwealth Division were en route and might indeed already have arrived. To cancel the movement at this stage would certainly be widely known and might well provide some fresh material for Communist propaganda, on the ground that it would be interpreted as showing a split in the common front. He referred to the presence on Kojé of the Netherlands Battalion and some contingents from other U.N. forces. I gathered that either Far East Command or 8th Army Headquarters planned to reinforce the U.S. and South Korean guard troops on Kojé with detachments from other U.N. units as a demonstration that there was a common front among the Allies and the settled determination to clean up the situation as soon as possible.

3. Foster, Bradley, and Lovett (with whom I later had a discussion) all spoke in the strongest language about the mishandling of the situation which had taken place and for which the U.S. forces were responsible. It was necessary to re-establish authority inside the stockades without any delay. It was also desirable to stiffen or replace South Korean guard troops because of their instability.

4. I said to them we now seemed to have arrived at a situation in which the military embarrassment of cancelling the movement of the Canadians had to be weighed against the political embarrassment in Canada of involving Canadian forces, and in consequence the Canadian Government, in participation in a situation for which they had no responsibility; it was evident that the move had important political undertones and should not be regarded as wholly a military matter. I feared that it might affect the close collaboration of Canada in the Korean operation, which we all desired to maintain. Since, however, the highest military authority here and the Secretary of Defense thought it would be a grave embarrassment to change the orders, what I would do is to lay their views before the Canadian Government. I mentioned also the points that the Canadian Brigade had been sent to Korea for combat duty only and that the Canadian Government throughout the last war had steadfastly resisted the break-up of Canadian overseas forces without prior consultation. On the last point, Foster jokingly remarked that he was sure it could be arranged for the whole Canadian Brigade to move to Koje.

5. I think that we shall have to acquiesce without further protest. Lovett and Foster expressed the hope that we would not instruct the Canadian Commander to refuse to make the Canadian detachment available. I said that the Canadian Government had no intention of interfering with the military chain of command. The order for the movement was, in our view, unwise and politically embarrassing. What we had hoped was that instructions to withdraw it would be despatched from Washington. I said that a move of this nature should not take place without prior intergovernmental consultation. This might do something to prevent a repetition of the same sort of thing.

6. Bradley remarked that General Clark at present was mainly concerned with clearing up the situation in the prison camps and was determined to take at once what action was necessary and consistent with the Geneva Convention to establish proper authority in the camps. Foster referred to the demotion announced yesterday of Dodd<sup>1</sup> and Colson<sup>2</sup> and added that in his judgment this was a quite insufficient penalty. To judge from a brief word with Freeman Matthews, I think that I shall hear no more from the State Department about our representations, since the views of the Department of Defense have been put to me on the highest level.

ASSIGNMENT OF CANADIAN TROOPS TO KOJE ISLAND

Please deliver the following message to the State Department. A statement along these lines will be made in the House of Commons this afternoon. Message begins:

The Canadian Government recognizes the importance of re-establishing and maintaining effective control over Communist prisoners of war captured in Korean operations. The Canadian Government also recognizes that custody of prisoners of war is a military responsibility which should be performed in accordance with military requirements.

It has, however, been a long established policy of the Canadian Government that Canadian forces despatched abroad for military operations should remain under Canadian command and control and that, except in the event of a military emergency which does not permit of time for consultation, no part of these forces should be detached therefrom except after consultation and with the agreement of the Canadian Government.

The Canadian Government therefore views with concern the despatch of a Company of the 25th Infantry Brigade to Kojé Island without prior consultation with the Canadian Government, and hopes that it may be possible to re-unite this Company with the rest of the Canadian Brigade as soon as possible. Meanwhile, the Canadian forces concerned will, of course, carry out loyally the orders of the Unified Command with respect to participation in guarding prisoners of war on Kojé Island. The Canadian Government also wishes to be reassured that, if it is proposed in the future to detach any Canadian forces from Canadian command and control for military or other duties, this will be done only after consultation and with the consent of the Canadian Government, except in the event of a military emergency which does not permit of time for such consultation. 1. I delivered at 2:30 p.m. to Freeman Matthews and Alexis Johnson of the State Department copies of the draft of the statement which you made in the House of Commons this afternoon, under a letter saying that I expected to follow up shortly and in a formal manner the request for assurances at the end of the message. We are not likely to get a written reply unless this request is made in a note to the Secretary of State.

2. I have doubts whether we will get a satisfactory answer. The State Department must consult the Pentagon, and the Pentagon would almost certainly consult Far East Command before a reply is made. There is likely to be an involved argument about the boundary between purely military issues within the discretion of the Field Commander and issues in which the political element is clear enough to call for inter-governmental consultation before orders are issued.

3. I feel sure that the case for satisfactory assurances would be strengthened if the United Kingdom Government were to express a view to the State Department which is parallel to our own position. It appears from London telegram No. 1299† of today that their reaction to the movement of their forces to Kojé is similar to ours.

4. If you wish me to make a formal issue of the question, I shall be glad to know how far you want me to go. Should it be limited to the central point in your statement? The statement given in EX-1181 deals only with our objection to the detachment without consultation of a part of our main force — an objection which in this instance could be met by sending the whole force to Kojé. This statement, however, as you said on the telephone, was drafted in a deliberate effort to head off awkward questions in parliament which might be seriously embarrassing to the United States. If its substance is incorporated in a note to the Secretary of State, should not a more rounded statement of our objectives to the movement be included?

If the only way by which we can get a reply to our representations is by a formal note, that, of course, will have to be sent to the State Department, if you have not already done so. However, we would be quite satisfied with an oral and less formal reply to the only request that we are making of the United States Government, namely, that contained in the last sentence of my statement in the House of Commons yesterday. Naturally we would like the reply to be in such a form that it could be made public. It certainly is not one that should cause difficulty or delay in Washington for it involves only the assurance that unless military emergencies make it necessary, our Brigade will not be broken up without consultation and agreement. In this connection you should point out that our force in Korea, unlike the forces of some of our United Nations allies, is a brigade group, or what I believe the Americans call a regimental combat team — in other words a self-contained military unit. Our request may be, as the press reports from Washington, “a tempest in a teapot” to United States officials, but it is of real importance to us because of the principle involved. It is also of no help to us to have an Eighth Army spokesman say that the proper procedure was observed when the Commonwealth General gave his consent to the move.

2. I think it important that we restrict our intervention, at least our formal intervention, to the question of the breaking up of the Brigade, and not confuse it with the other aspect of the Koje question which, though equally and possibly even more disturbing, is not one about which we have made any public statement or any formal representation to the United States. We are anxious here to avoid a discussion of this other aspect of the question, namely the wisdom of inserting troops of other nations than the United States into a situation which was created entirely by the United States and which, it might be thought, would have been dealt with by them. You will recall that a few days ago we asked for a copy of the report that General Clark was sending on the situation in Koje, a not unreasonable request in the circumstances. We have also made our concern over developments in Koje known in what was meant to be a friendly and constructive way. It seems an ironical return for this expression of interest to move a company of a Canadian Brigade to Koje. If the United States authorities felt that to re-unite the Brigade as soon as possible it was necessary to send the rest of the Canadian troops to Koje, the fat would certainly be in the fire. I hope, however, that this possibility is not advanced seriously.

3. I fully appreciate the desirability of taking our stand in this matter on grounds which would appeal not only to the United Kingdom but perhaps also to other countries involved in United Nations action in Korea. These governments may be less concerned than we are over the question of the unity of their forces in Korea. They must, it seems to me, be equally concerned over the action of the United States military authorities in taking a political decision regarding the employment of allied units without prior consultation with the governments concerned. I think that the impression that you gathered from General Bradley's statement as reported in your WA-1409 of May 24 that the despatch of contingents from other United Nations forces was designed as "a demonstration that there was a common front among the allies" indicates clearly enough that the United States authorities themselves must realize that this was in the nature of a political or political warfare decision. The question of prior consultation with the governments concerned in such decisions clearly raises a principle which has most important implications both in the United Nations and in the NATO context. I do not suggest that this consideration should be put forward formally at this time to the State Department as we wish to avoid the delays indicated in paragraph 2 of your WA 1418 of May 26 which might arise out of an argument on the question of the borderline between military and political decisions. I think, however, that in discussing this matter with the State Department you should let them know that in our view this further and very important principle is involved.

MOVEMENT OF CANADIAN COMPANY TO KOJE ISLAND

Following is the State Department's note of June 17th in reply to our note No. 375 of May 28th. Text begins:

Excellency:

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note No. 375, dated May 28, 1952, with reference to the transfer of a detachment from the 25th

Canadian Infantry Brigade in Korea for duty guarding prisoners of war on Koje Island. Your note expressed the desire of the Canadian Government to receive assurances that, if it is proposed in the future to detach any Canadian ground forces from this Brigade Group and its affiliated services, this will be done only after consultation and with the consent of the Canadian Government, except in the event of a military emergency which does not permit time for such consultation. It was also requested that the United States Government take the necessary steps to secure from the Unified Command the assurances sought by the Canadian Government.

The United States Government has given careful consideration to the attitude of the Canadian Government on this question as expressed in the note and also in the statement made by Mr. Pearson in Parliament, a copy of which was furnished to the Department of State shortly before its delivery. The United States Government has taken the matter up with the Commanding General of the United Nations Forces in Korea.

The Government of the United States is informed by the Commanding General that in the case of the transfer of the Canadian Rifle Company referred to, he explained personally to the Senior British Liaison Officer the proposed use of British Commonwealth troops, who in turn obtained concurrence of the Commander in Chief, British Commonwealth Forces. Prior to the issuance of the transfer order by the latter, the Commander of the Canadian Military Mission, Far East, was also informed. At the same time that the Canadian Company was transferred, a company of United Kingdom troops, a company of Greek troops and additional United States troops were similarly assigned to augment United Nations forces at Koje, which already included Netherlands, Republic of Korea, and of course, United States forces.

The Government of the United States, while appreciating the traditional policy of the Canadian Government that its forces despatched abroad for military operations should remain under Canadian command and control, must point out the implications of having injected into combined operations in the field the concept of governmental consultation and consent. This is the first occasion this type of problem has been raised by any government with forces in Korea serving under the Unified Command and the Government of the United States feels it necessary to point out the difficulties which could occur in combined operations if a commander should be required to take into account factors other than the direct military ones present when issuing a command for the deployment of his troops. If such practice should become widespread and one participating country or another should bring forward special conditions important to itself, it is not difficult to foresee the development of a situation which might so restrict the authority of the command as to threaten to jeopardize the success of our common struggle in Korea or of any combined operation. The Government of the United States is confident that the Canadian Government, for its part, will appreciate the importance of these considerations and also that circumstances may not always permit the Commanding General of the United Nations Forces in Korea to take into account special conditions affecting the service of several national contingents under its command.

Nevertheless, the United States Government appreciates the political importance attached by the Government of Canada to the maintenance of its forces as a unit and the public feeling in Canada underlying Canada's traditional position and, therefore, desires to meet the wishes of the Canadian Government in this matter insofar as practicable without endangering the United Nations military effort in Korea. Consequently, despite the concern expressed above, the United States Government states that while it may not in every instance be feasible or in the best interests of the United Nations Command as a whole, the United States Government will bear in mind the views of the Canadian Government and attempt to meet the desires of the Government of Canada.

KOREA; DESPATCH OF PART OF CANADIAN 25TH INFANTRY BRIGADE TO KOJE ISLAND

21. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to discussion at the meeting of May 28th said a reply had now been received to the note of that day which the Canadian Ambassador at Washington had delivered to the U.S. Secretary of State and which sought assurances from the U.S. government that in future Canadian ground forces would not be detached from the 25th Brigade without prior consultation with the Canadian government except in the event of a military emergency which did not permit time for such consultation.

The U.S. reply, dated June 17th, was to a certain extent contradictory. The State Department was obviously desirous of meeting the Canadian request in so far as the exigencies of the military situation permitted, whereas the Department of Defence rather implied that military operations could not be carried out successfully in Korea if the Unified Command was placed under the obligation of securing the consent of the Canadian government before ordering a deployment of troops which entailed separating any part of the 25th Canadian Infantry Brigade from the main body.

22. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted the report by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the United States reply to the Canadian note of May 28th, which sought assurances from the U.S. government that in future Canadian ground forces would not be detached from the 25th Canadian Infantry Brigade without prior consultation with and consent of the Canadian government except in the event of a military emergency which did not permit time for such consultation, and agreed that he indicate the U.S. reply was more or less satisfactory, but that it should not be published in extenso.

BOMBING OF YALU POWER INSTALLATIONS

Reference: Wilgress-Ignatieff telephone conversations.

Addressed External WA-1677, repeated Permdel New York No. 235.

1. This question was raised at a meeting this morning at the British Embassy with Lord Alexander and Mr. Lloyd. The meeting was attended by Ambassadors of Commonwealth countries with forces in Korea.

2. None of those present had received an advance warning of the operation except Lord Alexander, who said it had been mentioned to him when he was talking to General Bradley yesterday. He thought that, although the plans for the operation had probably been prepared for a considerable period, the decision to launch the attack had been taken only a short time ahead. There had been no discussion of such an operation when he was in Japan and Korea. Bradley told him this morning that reports received today about the results were highly favourable. Lord Alexander thinks it likely, however, that much of the damage will probably be quickly repaired.

3. There was some discussion about whether this action was in accordance with agreed policy, with Spender in particular questioning its propriety without prior consultation. Lloyd was troubled about the effect on opinion in the United Kingdom, particularly as it took place when Alexander and he were in Washington; it would be assumed by many that they had been consulted and had given their assent either when they were here or when they were in the Far East.

4. I have not yet had time to check our records so as to form an opinion whether there was any understanding that consultation would take place before the installations were bombed. I believe, however, that, since the matter was last discussed a good many months ago, the circumstances, both military and political, have changed considerably. The installations are, of course, a legitimate military target and the power they produce is certainly being employed for munitions making and other military purposes in both North Korea and Manchuria.

5. Confirming the information given by Ignatieff by telephone, the State Department's comments, as given by Alexis Johnson, are:

(a) That the State Department knew that the attack was going to take place, but did not tell any of the other governments concerned in Washington as they regarded the attack within existing policy, i.e., not to extend air attack of Korea with exceptions known to us;

(b) That the attack was based upon existing military directives, and

(c) That the attack was based upon purely military considerations and did not have any direct political implications. He admitted that it might have some political effects upon the discussions at Panmunjom, but these should be regarded as by-products.

6. It seems to me that Johnson under-emphasized the probable effect on the armistice negotiations. I think it likely that this attack at this particular juncture was intended to show the Communists how vulnerable they would be to retaliation if they sought to stage a massive air offensive; such a demonstration of air power might bring about a disposition to meet us on the issue of prisoners of war.

YALU BOMBING

Reference: Your telegram WA-1677 of June 24, 1952.

This is a very strange business and difficult to understand especially as Alexander and party were in Korea at the time these plans were being made and were told nothing about them. It seems to be an inadequate return for Alexander's friendly statements about United States operations in Korea. I note that the State Department thought that the Allied Military Missions in Japan were informed in advance of the bombings. The Minister of National Defence has just received a telegram from the Canadian Military Mission to the effect that neither General Bridgeford nor Connelly<sup>5</sup> were informed of the intention to bomb the hydro installations. I hope that we will not be asked to take too seriously the statement that there are no direct political implications in this operation.

Addressed External WA-1697, repeated Permdel No. 240.

1. I mentioned this matter to Hickerson this afternoon before receiving your telegram. Hickerson said that there had been an intention to inform through military channels (I think in Washington) the British and perhaps two or three other governments, including ourselves, that the operation was to be undertaken. The operation, however, got under way in advance of expectations here and was actually going on when Bradley mentioned it to Alexander on Monday morning. While he agreed that there were political implications in the operation, he insisted — and they will stick to this story — that they were only incidental to its military purpose. He confirmed that none of the Allied military representatives in Tokyo had been warned.

2. Hickerson, who spent part of this morning with the Joint Chiefs of Staff, went on to emphasize the difficulties in the way of consultation with other governments before undertaking an operation like this. It was absolutely essential to maintain complete secrecy; if there had been the slightest warning, anti-aircraft guns, in the use of which the Chinese were showing great efficiency, would have been rushed to the power installations. It was quite impossible to let any government in whose security they did not have entire confidence know that the operation was planned. If governments whose security they trusted had been consulted in advance and an argument had developed over whether it should be undertaken, experience had shown that there was usually a leak before the argument was concluded.

3. There is a good deal of force in these views. I referred to the exchanges of last September as at least implying that a few trusted governments would be notified in advance. He said that he had not studied the records himself, but that Johnson had done so and had assured him that there was no commitment at that time on the part of the Unified Command.

4. He told me that Alexander and Lloyd had had a further discussion with United States officials, I think at the State Department, shortly before they left Washington at 2 p.m. yesterday. Alexander seemed quite unperturbed and remarked that the action was a very good show; this is the impression he gave me at the British Embassy earlier that day. Lloyd, however, had been deeply worried at the prospect of the political reaction in the United Kingdom, correctly anticipating the reaction of the Opposition.

5. We have learned from the Australian Embassy that they were told by the State Department on April 16th that notwithstanding the consultations of last September, the conclusion had been reached here that a strike against the power installations could be undertaken without governmental consultation. The State Department added that there was no intention at that time to take this action. The Australian Government apparently did not comment on this view, which was not communicated by the State Department to the British or ourselves. My last discussion of possible action against the power facilities was that reported in my WA-3571 of October 2nd, 1951.

YALU BOMBING

Reference: Your WA-1697 of June 25.

We have noticed from a C.R.O. telegram that the State Department has apologized for the error in judgment in failing to appreciate the reaction of political opinion in allied countries. This evening's papers say that Mr. Acheson has made an apology in London.

2. This, together with the fact that the military authorities in the United States considered the question of the Yalu bombing sufficiently doubtful to have it cleared with the State Department and the President, would seem to us to make it impossible for the State Department to maintain any longer that the action was purely military and had no political implications.

3. You will have noted the inconsistencies between Mr. Lovett's public statement that he assumed that other United Nations members had been aware of the plan for the attack through their liaison officers, and the fact that those liaison officers had never been informed.

4. It does not seem to me that any useful purpose would be served at this time by public criticism or by formal representations to the State Department. I would be grateful however, when you next see Mr. Hickerson, if you would, in the light of the information set forth above, inform him that I trust that the State Department now accepts the view that the political implications of the Yalu bombing were of sufficient importance to warrant consultation by the United States with its principal allies. You should go on to express our hope that there will be better procedures for consultations in the future so that a recurrence of this kind of thing can be avoided.

5. You might explain to Mr. Hickerson that we are especially interested in this matter at the present time since the CCF may arise this matter when the supplementary estimates of the Department come before the House.<sup>7</sup>

YALU BOMBING AND INTER-ALLIED LIAISON ON KOREAN PROBLEMS

1. It is likely that one result of the Yalu affair will be that the British at least will improve their position for getting advance knowledge about what is being planned, perhaps by the appointment of a British Deputy Chief of Staff to General Clark. We have long been worried by the defects in our own liaison, especially in the case of actions which, from the military point of view, may be covered by existing agreed directives, but nevertheless have strong political implications. The Yalu bombing and the movement of Canadian troops to Kojé are the two most recent examples.

2. In Washington, the regular meetings which have been held at the State Department since January, 1951, have for some time been only an occasion for giving out information on what has already taken place. The size of the meetings and the lack of confidence in the security of some governments represented makes this limitation a necessity. Furthermore, the presence of a Korean representative prevents discussion at these meetings of Korean internal problems.

3. Consultation about future plans takes place occasionally at small meetings summoned by the State Department, attended usually by representatives of the Commonwealth Governments with combat forces in Korea. Normally consultation is done on a bilateral basis, with the initiative taken by the Embassy concerned. Information also is sometimes volunteered by the State Department to individual Embassies. These procedures are ineffective for dealing with mixed military and political matters.

This was approved by Mr. Pearson before despatch. E[scott] R[eid]

4. I mentioned when in Ottawa last week that I thought that better means of contact on such matters might be developed in Tokyo rather than in Washington. How it could best be achieved I do not know, but it seems quite evident from recent experience that our methods of liaison with Clark's headquarters are unsatisfactory. No uniform system covering all governments which have contributed forces can be safely devised.

5. At this stage the British are making the running with the Americans, particularly taking advantage of the presence of Acheson in London. Perhaps we should now discuss the issues frankly with the British, expressing whatever doubts we may have about their securing an exclusive position.

6. I suggest improvements in Tokyo rather than in Washington for another reason. Here, when we discuss matters with the State Department, our observations, if they require discussion with Far East Command, must go from the State Department to the Pentagon and thence to Tokyo, a course during which they may well be annotated, distorted, or expunged. I have considered the possibility of proposing meetings with mixed State Department and Pentagon representatives, but I am sure that that would not work. Such an idea is distasteful to the Pentagon, and in any case there can scarcely be open discrimination in favour of the more trusted governments with forces in Korea.

7. An important question, which applies to the Yalu bombing and similar military operations with political aspects, is whether (provided they are not clearly outside existing directives) it is reasonable to ask for advance information or for prior consultation. As Acheson explained in London yesterday, it had been intended to give advance information on the Yalu operation to the British and perhaps others here, but only within a few hours of the operation itself. Hickerson held forth to me on Wednesday about the real risks involved if prior consultation were undertaken and also the difficulty of deciding what governments can safely be consulted. (See my WA-1697 of June 25th.)

YALU BOMBING

Reference: Your EX-1431 of June 26.

1. I discussed the contents of your message with Hickerson this afternoon. As to paragraph 2, he pointed out accurately that the State Department had never maintained that the action was purely military and had no political implications. They have admitted that there were political implications, but have taken the position that these were incidental to the military purposes.

2. We had a lengthy discussion based on the observations in your paragraph 4 about the possible improvement of methods of consultation. You will have received my WA-1712 of this morning on this general subject. Hickerson went over at length all the difficulties in the way of determining "the principal allies" who might be consulted. As illustrations, he said that they had confidence in Turkey's internal security. But Turkish codes were vulnerable, and that French codes also were vulnerable and there were still doubts about French internal security. He agreed, of course, that the reaction, in Great Britain especially, to the Yalu bombing was unfortunate, particularly because of the presence of British Ministers in Washington at the time. The most that he thought could be done before an operation such as this was undertaken would be privately to inform the British and possibly a few other governments that the operation was about to take place, using a military channel; the military risks involved were too great to warrant an attempt to secure governmental approval from whatever governments could in the context be regarded as the principal allies.

3. He asked me whether I thought the British Cabinet would be in a happier position if they had in fact been either informed or consulted about the operation — a pertinent question. Would it have been easier for you to deal with the question asked in the House yesterday if you had been able to answer that the Canadian Government was consulted before the action took place?

4. This discussion confirmed me in the view expressed in my WA-1712 that we should go over these issues with the British to find out what they are aiming at, and should seek for approved arrangements in Tokyo as a possible means of improving contact. Hickerson incidentally mentioned that in talks with Alexander here about the possibility of appointing a British Deputy Chief of Staff to General Clark it had been made clear that in the United States view other Commonwealth countries should participate in some way in such an arrangement if it were adopted.

5. Hickerson gave me a number of illustrations of the difficulties which the State Department had faced when it had leaked out that information about the Korean situation had been given only to a selected few. The last instance was a vigorous complaint from the French Embassy based on a report, which was in fact untrue, that the British had been told in advance about the Yalu operation.

Following is text of telegram on command arrangements in Korea from the Commonwealth Relations Office to Earncliffe, dated June 27, which was handed to us by the Acting High Commissioner yesterday with a request for a reply in time for the governmental statement in the House of Commons in London on July 1. Begins:

1) Mr. Acheson (at his meeting in London) has informed Foreign Secretary that United States Government have agreed to suggestion for appointment of a Deputy Chief of Staff for operations in Korea at General Clark's headquarters but would like this officer to "represent interests" of other Commonwealth Governments concerned as well.

2) We would greatly welcome an arrangement under which United Kingdom officer for this post would be a "Commonwealth" appointment and very much hope that Mr. Acheson's proposal will commend itself to other Commonwealth Governments with forces in Korea (Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and India). It should improve contacts between the Commonwealth and the United Nations Command on the purely military side and thus prove of value to our collective effort in Korea.

3) In debates in both Houses on 1st July it is contemplated that Minister of Defence and Minister of State will make statements about their visit to Korea and we would wish to make appropriate announcement about Deputy Chief of Staff appointment then. Ends.

2. You may say to the United Kingdom authorities that for our part we would welcome the appointment of a United Kingdom officer as Deputy Chief of Staff to General Mark Clark and think that this may prove a very helpful development. It would certainly be useful from our point of view that this officer should bear in mind the interests of other Commonwealth countries with forces in Korea and we would appreciate an arrangement of this kind. For your own information, we have some doubts as to how far a Deputy Chief of Staff could go in representing Commonwealth interests. His first loyalty would, of course, have to be to General Mark Clark and through him to the United States Chiefs of Staff. In view of his position on General Clark's staff, he could not in practice, it seems to us, be a channel of communication to the Commonwealth military liaison officers. Despite these inevitable limitations on his usefulness in improving our contacts with the United Nations Command, we can see advantage from our point of view in his appointment, particularly if an officer is chosen who possesses some sensitivity to political developments. Such an officer could no doubt call to General Clark's attention from time to time the necessity for consultation with authorities of Commonwealth countries on operational decisions having a political or semi-political content. In this connection we should like to see a copy of the directive if issued by the United Kingdom Government to the Deputy Chief of Staff.

3. With regard to the suggestion that this should be a "Commonwealth appointment" you should say to the United Kingdom authorities that we are quite a little puzzled by such a description of the nature of the appointment. In our view the appointment of a Deputy Chief of Staff to General Mark Clark would obviously be a United Nations appointment. The decision to appoint a Commonwealth officer to this post is surely one for the Unified Command. As already explained, we would welcome the appointment of a Commonwealth officer to the post but we feel that it should be made clear in any United Kingdom Government statement in the House of Commons that this appointment is made by the Unified Command on behalf of the United Nations.

4. You will recall that during the discussions relative to the formation of the First (Commonwealth) Division, the Canadian Government, while welcoming the formation of the Division, for operational purposes felt that it was essential that the title should be approved by the Unified Command. As reported in United Kingdom Army message from Kure, Japan, No. Z 8233 of April 29, 1951, "specific concurrence of Unified Command has been obtained 'First (Commonwealth) Division, United Nations forces.' " You may wish to draw this telegram to the attention of the United Kingdom authorities as precedent.

The following is for your general guidance.

2. The Prime Minister feels you will no doubt have in mind the attitude we have maintained here about our participation in the Korean conflict. Canada recognized an obligation to the United Nations and wished to discharge that obligation directly and not by means of a contribution to a Commonwealth effort to discharge any joint Commonwealth obligation. The directive issued to

Brigadier Rockingham<sup>8</sup> instructed him to proceed to Korea with the 25th Canadian Infantry Brigade Group under his command for operations with the United Nations forces under the control of the Commander of such forces. Paragraph 7 of those directives was as follows:

"The principle of the separate entity of the Canadian Force, however, shall at all times be maintained. While the grouping of forces is a matter for the operational command to decide, it is anticipated that in the normal course of operations or other activities of the United Nations Forces, your tasks and undertaking will be so allotted or arranged, having regard to the size of the Canadian Force, that its Canadian entity will readily be preserved."

3. We are anxious to have this new development made and announced in such manner as not to conflict with this general attitude.

We are considering this problem in the light of the recent discussion in London between Mr. Acheson and Mr. Eden (see telegrams 1489 of June 30 and 1514 of July 3 from Canada House).†

2. In the meantime, I think that it would be desirable for you to explain informally the following to the State Department, at the earliest convenient opportunity.

3. The Canadian Government welcomes the appointment of a Commonwealth officer<sup>10</sup> as Deputy Chief of Staff to General Clark. We have no doubt that the State Department will agree with our view that the appointment is not a substitute for any existing obligations to consult, or for any existing methods of consultation and liaison with, the Canadian Government, on political or military matters relating to the prosecution of the war or the employment of the Canadian forces. We consider the appointment of the Deputy Chief of Staff as an additional device.

4. Probably the foregoing is well-understood by the State Department, the Pentagon and the United Nations Commander, but we wish to assist in avoiding any future misunderstanding by saying it to the State Department and through them to the Pentagon and General Clark.

5. If you see any objection to this course, I should be grateful for your views.

CONSULTATIONS ON MILITARY OPERATIONS IN KOREA

Reference: Your EX-1523 of July 10.

1. I have given the State Department the contents of paragraph 3 of your message in the form of an "oral message". In doing so I said that I was sure that it would cause no difficulties, but that we would like to be certain that our understanding of the effect on consultation of the appointment of a Commonwealth General as Deputy Chief of Staff to General Clark was shared by the State Department, the Pentagon, and General Clark.

2. Developments since June 27 have not led me to alter the views on the methods of consultation which I expressed in my messages WA-1712 and WA-1726 of that date,<sup>11</sup> except to give rise to doubts that a useful system can be established in Tokyo. I note from London telegrams 1514 of July 3,† 1499 of July 2,† and 1489 of June 30,† that the difficulties are clearly realized there in the way of establishing additional means of consultation which must, for security reasons, be restricted to a narrow selection from the governments with forces in Korea. We have received from the Australian Embassy a copy of a telegram on this subject dated July 5, which must also have been sent to you. The chief suggestions, that "United States-British Commonwealth consultative machinery" in Washington should be strengthened and that a political adviser to General Clark might transmit information through "ambassadors in Tokyo of a selection of countries providing forces in Korea", are of doubtful practicality. Such arrangements, unless kept wholly secret, would arouse strong protests from governments excluded from participation; if they were kept secret, the governments included in them would be precluded from using publicly any information received in this way in dealing with Parliamentary or other enquiries.

3. Probably we shall have to make do with existing methods of consultation. There are some indications that the rumpus over the Yalu bombing has increased the anxiety of the State Department to keep some governments, including ourselves, fully informed.

4. Something might also be done to make possible the provision in Tokyo of political advice to General Clark on a regular basis, such as by the appointment of an American adviser to his staff. It would, I think, be impossible to arrange that such advice should be given on a collective basis and that the ambassadors in Tokyo of certain countries should participate. A development of this sort nevertheless might be useful. In addition, the appointment of a British General as Deputy Chief of Staff should help to ensure that GHQ Tokyo in considering future operations will not look at plans wholly through American eyes.

I had already reminded General Bishop of the CRO of your desire to see whatever directive or terms of reference might be drawn up for the new Deputy Chief of Staff. Bishop has assured us of their intention to clear with other Commonwealth Governments and to do so before discussion in Washington. Bishop has been sitting in on Chiefs of Staff discussions and this procedure is well understood in service quarters concerned.

2. Bishop added that the problem was extremely difficult, especially in view of the need to safeguard existing channels and to preserve existing obligations to consult, as you also had pointed out.

3. We sounded out Bishop today on the progress being made with the draft instructions. He indicated that yesterday, July 16, the Cabinet Defence Committee had considered a Chiefs of Staff paper. He was as yet not informed of the outcome as he was still waiting to receive the necessary record. He reiterated that our interest in the matter was being kept in mind and that his Secretary of State had been acquainted with the position set out in paragraph 3 of your telegram No. 1374 of July 10.

4. I think there can be no doubt that the document under consideration includes a set of draft instructions which embody an attempt on the part of the United Kingdom authorities, as the prime movers in this matter, to reconcile the need to safeguard existing arrangements vis-à-vis the Americans with the compulsion to implement somehow or other the public announcement of July 1. In view of the clear intention to discuss the detailed proposals with other Commonwealth Governments and with the United States Government, it may be premature to assume that the final product is intended to be an instruction issuing from the United Kingdom Government.

APPOINTMENT OF DEPUTY CHIEF OF STAFF, KOREA

Although we have been keeping in touch with United Kingdom authorities, we had received no previous indication that the United Kingdom proposals would be put to us with such urgency. The matter has evidently caused some difficulty for the United Kingdom authorities and I learned yesterday from Foreign Office and defence sources that Mr. Churchill would gladly have dropped it but for the impossibility of presenting such a decision to Parliament.

2. The directive set out in Y-No. 300 seems intended as a directive from the British Chiefs of Staff agreed with the Chiefs of Staff of the other Commonwealth governments concerned. That is obviously the form in which United Kingdom planners would first prepare the text but you may have wished to have some explanation of why it is being circulated in that form not only to us but to the Unified Command. My present information is that the United Kingdom authorities for their part feel that it is essential to leave the appointed officer in no doubt about his responsibility and about the channels of communication. Perhaps at this stage I should not enquire further without hearing from you.

3. As regards channels of communication in particular, you may not be entirely convinced that the establishment of separate United Kingdom liaison machinery in Tokyo is unrelated to the appointment of a British Deputy Chief of Staff. Since the draft directive allows for the transmission of information by this deputy on the authority (perhaps the word "instruction" might be better) of the United Nations Commander, the deputy would no doubt have to pass the information through the Tokyo-to-Canberra link unless separate United Kingdom liaison was established. This may also pose the further question whether the British Deputy Chief of Staff must or should discriminate between the several Commonwealth liaison channels in Tokyo when passing on information in such circumstances.

APPOINTMENT OF DEPUTY CHIEF OF STAFF, KOREA

Reference: You tel. 1645 of July 23.

Following from Acting Under-Secretary, Begins:

1. As the Acting United Kingdom High Commissioner had not received a reply from London to our request for delay, we told him today that the Prime Minister's views were as follows:

"We adhere completely to the views previously expressed regarding the Deputy Chief of Staff to General Clark in Tokyo. (See our telegram 1306 of June 28.)<sup>13</sup> We feel that the statement should make it clear that the appointment of the Deputy is being made by the United Nations Commander or the Unified Command and we also feel that a simultaneous statement should be issued by either the Unified Command or the United Nations Commander."

2. The Prime Minister would like you to give these views immediately to the United Kingdom Government. You might suggest the following new paragraph for insertion in the draft statement:

"The actual appointment is being made by the United Nations Commander, General Clark, under the authority vested in him by the Unified Command of the United Nations."

3. The draft statement is acceptable subject to the above. If United Kingdom Government agrees on the need for a simultaneous announcement of the appointment by the Unified Command or the United Nations Commander (probably the latter), we assume that the United Kingdom will put this point to the United States Government.

4. General Foulkes sees no objection to the draft "directive" to be issued to General Shoosmith by the United Kingdom Chiefs of Staff.

5. We trust that the United Kingdom authorities will inform you (perhaps through CJS) of the changes contemplated in the United Kingdom military liaison machinery in Tokyo, in view of the possibility that those changes may affect Canada.

6. If anything further should be proposed requiring Canadian concurrence, it would be appreciated if a reasonable time-limit could be allowed. Unless you see an objection to doing so, would you please explain this point to the Commonwealth Relations Office.

Present State of Armistice Discussions<sup>15</sup>

The discussions on Item 3 of the armistice agenda<sup>16</sup> (arrangements for supervision) are at present deadlocked over the question of freedom for the Communists to rehabilitate airfields anywhere in North Korea and to extend their runways. The United Nations Command is willing to allow rehabilitation of specified airfields for civilian use but not to allow unrestricted rehabilitation or the lengthening of runways anywhere. The Communist negotiators have termed this intolerable interference in the internal affairs of North Korea. The atmosphere at the talks has been such that the United Nations Command is not prepared to make any concessions on this point for the time being, although it may make them when the atmosphere improves. Agreement on a warning declaration to be issued after an armistice is concluded will make concessions less difficult. The United Nations Command is also not satisfied with Communist attempts to prohibit replacement of material and supplies used up for training during the armistice.

2. Discussion on Item 4 (prisoners of war) is also deadlocked, the Communists being unwilling to agree that prisoners of war should be free to elect whether they will be exchanged or not. They are also unwilling to entertain a suggestion that prisoners be exchanged one-for-one until all prisoners in Communist hands have been released, even though the United Nations would be willing, after this exchange, to release the balance of prisoners they hold.

The armistice agenda items were: 1. adoption of the agenda; 2. establishment of a military demarcation line and demilitarized zone; 3. arrangements for supervision of the cease fire and armistice; 4. arrangements concerning prisoners of war; 5. recommendations to the governments concerned on both sides.

The Communists are further opposed to discussion of the release of civilian internees along with the exchange of prisoners of war.

3. Item 5 (recommendations to the governments concerned on both sides) has not been touched. It is expected that under this item the Communist negotiators may give some indication of the sort of political settlement they expect to flow from any post-armistice discussions.

4. The agreement on a specific military demarcation line having expired on December 27th, it will be necessary immediately before signature of the armistice to define a new line. The basis of the new line has already been agreed: it is that the line should, by and large, follow the line of contact immediately before the signature of the armistice.

5. A recent United Kingdom estimate, which is believed to be in Mr. Churchill's possession, expresses the opinion that the Communists will agree to an armistice in Korea only on terms which will give them a strong bargaining position for the future. It is our view that they may well be content with an armistice which restores the status quo ante bellum with the intention of profiting by the armistice to subvert the government of South Korea and win over that country to communism.

The Warning Declaration

6. On the initiative of the United States, agreement has been reached among most of the governments with fighting forces in Korea to issue a declaration, the operative sentences in which would be the following:

We affirm, in the interests of world peace, that if there is a renewal of the armed attack, challenging again the principles of the United Nations, we should again be united and prompt to resist. The consequences of such a breach of the armistice would be so grave that, in all probability, it would not be possible to confine hostilities within the frontiers of Korea.

7. The purpose of this declaration is to make it possible for General Ridgway to make more concessions to meet Communist reluctance to agree to adequate conditions for supervising the armistice. General Ridgway, it is argued, would feel free to accept greater risks if he knew that the enemy would be warned that a breach of faith would have such serious consequences. There has been some discussion about the time at which this warning declaration should be issued. The original plan, to which all the countries consulted have so far subscribed, is that it should be issued immediately after the signing of the armistice. The United Kingdom Embassy in Washington is known to have suggested to the Foreign Office that it should instead be issued only if it appears that the armistice is not likely to be loyally observed, but we have no evidence that this suggestion has been taken up by the United Kingdom or any other government.

Post-Armistice Negotiations

8. In discussions of the means by which a political settlement should be reached after the armistice has become effective, it seems to be generally agreed that that settlement will have to be attempted through the United Nations, and that the General Assembly is the organ which should be responsible for constructing the machinery to bring the settlement about. Beyond this, however, the picture is not clear. We understand that the United States is willing to negotiate in good faith to try to obtain a political settlement in Korea although we also understand that it is unwilling to negotiate directly with the Central People's Government of China as an interested party. The United Kingdom, on the other hand, seems to think that the United States can be persuaded to enter into direct negotiations with the Central People's Government.

The Nature of the Settlement

9. There has been little or no discussion of what sort of political settlement might be reached in Korea. It appears to be generally assumed that the ultimate aim of the United Nations is, and must remain, a united, independent and democratic Korea. Whether the United States and the United Kingdom are willing to accept a political settlement growing out of the post-armistice negotiations which may result in a divided Korea for some years to come is not yet clear. As this seems to be the most that the Communists will concede, it is probably necessary to realize that if they will not accept such an arrangement, there can be no political settlement of the Korean war in the foreseeable future. The need for armed forces in other parts of the world would make such an outcome highly undesirable.

TELEGRAM EX-314

Ottawa, February 7, 1952

SECRET. IMPORTANT.

Following from Under-Secretary.

1. Before leaving Ottawa the Minister asked me to inform you that he would be grateful if you could, if possible before the Secretary of State leaves for Europe, have a general informal discussion at a high level in the State Department concerning the political problems with which we are now, or may soon be, faced in Korea.

Breakdown In The Armistice Negotiations

2. The Minister has been concerned by the suggestion in some United States publications that a breakdown in the armistice negotiations would create a crisis and that as a result of this crisis there might arise a demand in the United States for an extension or intensification of the war in Korea.

3. If there is danger that a breakdown in the armistice negotiations might lead to such a demand, then he suggests that it would be the course of wisdom for our side to use its best efforts to avoid a formal breakdown, even if it becomes clear to both sides that further meetings of the armistice negotiators are likely to have no positive result. This could be done by a willingness on our side to accept an almost indefinite prolongation of the negotiations, accompanied perhaps by brief and infrequent meetings.

4. In any event, whether there is a formal breakdown of negotiations or whether the negotiations should drag along indefinitely, he is of the opinion that we should not, on our side, consider a failure of the negotiations as constituting a reason for extending or intensifying the military operations. You will recall that a year or so ago it was quite generally considered that a de facto cease fire in Korea might be the best immediate outcome of the war which we could hope for. At present we have what amounts to a virtual de facto cease fire on land which both sides appear to be willing to accept. If we cannot succeed in turning the de facto cease fire on land into a de jure armistice, then the Minister suggests that our interests would be served by continuing the de facto cease fire on land and perhaps even testing whether the de facto cease fire on land might not gradually be extended to the air. The extension to the air would, of course, depend on the enemy showing himself willing in practice to give a quid pro quo by desisting from some of his activities which are disadvantageous to us.

5. The Minister believes that there are relatively few people in most of the Western countries who would consider that a breakdown in the armistice negotiations which did not result from a mass aggressive attack by the enemy would justify the United Nations taking any initiative to extend or intensify the war.

Secret Approach to the Soviet Union

6. In his message to you No. EX-68 of January 9+ you will recall that the Minister welcomed the statement in your WA-4285 of December 22+ that it was thought not unlikely in the State Department that the "Soviet Government will be sounded out on the possible terms of settlement in Korea and on the procedures." He went on to request you to tell the State Department that it seemed to him important that, once an armistice had been agreed on, secret soundings be taken of the Russians to find out if it was possible to reach agreement with them on the resolutions to be put before the Security Council and the General Assembly setting up the machinery for an armistice settlement. You reported in your telegram WA-121 of January 12+ that you had not been able to take this matter up at a high level. The Minister thinks it would be useful if you were now to raise the question at a high level.

7. In your discussions with the State Department on this aspect of the problem you might indicate that on further reflection the Minister is not convinced that the sounding out of the Russians on the resolutions to be put before the U.N. creating a U.N. negotiating commission need await the conclusion of an armistice and that in fact it seems to him that the Russian desire for an armistice might be increased if the Russians were informed that, in the event of an armistice, the United States would be prepared to support in the United Nations, provided that Russia was also willing to give its support, a resolution which would do little more than establish a commission to negotiate with all interested governments and authorities a political settlement in Korea for submission to the General Assembly for approval.

Objectives of a Political Settlement in Korea

8. There has been a good deal of discussion among the United States, the United Kingdom, ourselves and some other countries of the machinery which might be set up following an armistice to negotiate a political settlement in Korea. There does not appear to have been very much discussion of the kind of political settlement in Korea which we want or would be willing to accept. Indeed, it seems to be generally assumed that our objective in the negotiations should be a "unified, independent and democratic" Korea though we might have to be satisfied with a divided Korea.

9. It seems to the Minister that the time has come when we should re-examine this question in an effort to decide whether in fact the achievement of the objective of a "unified, independent and democratic" Korea at this time would be more in our interests than the restoration of the status quo ante bellum with the frontier moved from the parallel to the armistice line.

10. This is obviously not an easy problem. It is possible that the assessment of where our interests lie depends mainly on two considerations. The first is whether the chances of the Communists getting control by peaceful means of the whole of Korea would be increased or diminished by the creation of a "unified, independent and democratic" Korea. The second is the importance which we attach to preventing or delaying such a development and the cost which the Western world is willing to pay in an attempt to prevent or delay it in terms of such things as guarantees against external aggression and economic assistance. It can be argued that a unified Korea would before long become a satellite of the Communists without any act of aggression by either China or the Soviet Union.

11. Mr. Pearson would be glad to know the views of the State Department on these questions.

TELEGRAM EX-317

Ottawa, February 7, 1952

SECRET. IMPORTANT.

Following from Under-Secretary,

1. The Minister, before he left, asked me to send you this message about the issue of prisoners of war in the Korean Armistice negotiations.

2. From the telegrams which we have received on the armistice negotiations, it seems clear that the stumbling block to an agreement may well be the conflict between the United Nations demand for voluntary repatriation of prisoners and the Communist demand for unconditional release and repatriation of prisoners.

3. We appreciate the very strong arguments in favour of the United Nations demand for the voluntary repatriation of prisoners. There would certainly be strong protests in this country against returning to the North Korean or Chinese authorities prisoners of war whom we hold and who do not want to be returned because of their opposition to those communist regimes. We also appreciate the strong desire of the United States that steps be taken to get American prisoners of war repatriated as soon as possible.

4. The issue is further complicated in our opinion by the question whether it is in the interest of the Western World to establish in Korea the precedent that prisoners of war have the right to waive their right to repatriation. If this precedent is established by the Korean Armistice, the Soviet Union might in the event of a general war contend that any prisoners of war whom they hold had the right at any time during hostilities to request release from prison camp in lieu of eventual repatriation, and, having been released from camp, to enlist in the armed forces of Russia. The position of Allied prisoners of war in Soviet hands would be difficult enough in any event. We would not want to make it more difficult by putting them in a position where the Soviet Government could, with some outward show of legality, intimidate them into waiving their right to repatriation and into enlisting in the Soviet army. Clearly the prime difficulty in dealing with the Russians would be to ensure that our prisoners were not intimidated into "voluntarily" requesting not to be repatriated. Intimidation could take many forms.

5. One of the principles of the Geneva (Prisoners of War) Convention of August 12, 1949, is the unconditional release and repatriation of prisoners. See Articles 7 and 118 of the Convention. Presumably, the Western Powers had this principle embodied in the Convention because they considered that it would serve their interests in a general war. The United Nations proposal for the voluntary repatriation of prisoners of war is, in the opinion of our Legal Division, contrary to these Articles.

6. Most of the countries which have forces in Korea have not yet ratified this Convention and the Communist forces in Korea have not lived up to it. Our countries have, however, devoted considerable efforts to trying to conclude the Geneva (Red Cross) Humanitarian Conventions with the Soviet Union in the hope that if these Conventions are in force during a general war, they will at least do something to render less likely harsh and arbitrary treatment by the Russians of our prisoners. Our countries, therefore, have an interest in preserving the principles of these Conventions.

7. The Minister would be grateful if you would discuss this very difficult matter with the State Department. He does not want to give the impression that we are raising this matter because we believe that the United Nations should now withdraw its demand for the voluntary repatriation of prisoners. He is, however, concerned that the acceptance by the Communists of this demand might create a dangerous precedent and that in an effort to be humane to anti-Communist Korean and Chinese prisoners whom we hold, we may be making more likely inhumane treatment in future of prisoners of war held by the Russians. The Minister appreciates the extraordinary difficulty and delicacy of this problem and the gravity of any decision which is reached.

PROSPECTS OF A KOREAN ARMISTICE

1. I had a long talk with Hickerson yesterday afternoon in order to review the general situation. This did not throw much new light on it. I asked him about the Communist proposals under Item 5 of the agenda which are reported in yesterday's press despatches. He said that these were acceptable to the State Department (including the recommendation for a political conference within 90 days after the armistice) subject to a revision of the third point. The Joint Chiefs of Staff, who issue the instructions to Ridgway, have been informed that the State Department would accept this point if it is worded to read "other Korean questions related to peace" instead of "other questions related to peace in Korea". The purpose of this change is to exclude at the next stage the introduction of Far Eastern issues not directly related to a settlement in Korea.

2. In Hickerson's judgment the main sticking point concerns the repatriation of prisoners of war. Provided agreement is reached on this, Ridgway is authorized to make concessions on the problem of airfield construction during the armistice. It seems unlikely that the Communists will accept the principle of voluntary repatriation. I made the personal suggestion that a distinction might be made between Chinese prisoners who had entered Korea as members of a foreign military force and Korean prisoners who were willing or unwilling participants in a civil war. I said I thought it would be hard to accept repatriation of all the Koreans, but wondered whether we might find justifiable grounds for returning all Chinese prisoners. This matter is under active consideration here and any views which the Canadian Government may wish to express would be welcome. It presents difficult moral issues, and I am far from certain that the Unified Command can decently agree to the compulsory repatriation of all the Chinese.

3. Hickerson expressed confidence that the other points in dispute, including the rate of rotation of troops, could be settled in time. The recent meetings have given some grounds for belief that the Communists really desire an armistice, but he does not rate the chances to be much better than even.

4. I then asked him whether the possibility of an indefinite prolongation of the armistice negotiations was in their minds here. He said that Ridgway's instructions still stood to the effect that the United Nations side was not to be responsible for a breakdown. If the negotiations dragged on for several months, what might amount almost to a de facto cease-fire for the ground forces was a possible development, although air and naval action would have to continue.

5. Their plans for the issuance of the warning declaration have not changed, i.e., they consider that signature of it by the Ambassadors of countries concerned here should take place almost simultaneously with the signature of the armistice, and that it should at once be transmitted to the Secretary General. He described the British proposal that the transmission should take place under cover of separate but identical notes as a matter of no real importance.

6. Their plans for post-armistice action in the United Nations are also as previously reported. He said that the State Department did not rule out private discussions with the Russians before the Assembly would be convened to deal with Korean issues, but they would object to such discussions taking place in advance of the signature of an armistice. They continue to prefer their draft of a resolution for the Assembly, but recognize, of course, that it is open to change in negotiation with other governments.

7. We then discussed possible courses of action if the Communists break off the negotiations or in the more extreme circumstances of a flagrant breach of an armistice. There seems to be no change in their thinking in the latter case that bombing of Chinese targets and a naval blockade of the Chinese coast ought to be undertaken. In the former case he agreed with my observation that a resumption of heavy ground fighting would lead to a strong popular demand on the Administration for some sort of direct action against China. In either case he undertook that there would be consultation with the other governments with forces in Korea (except for the reservation previously made of vital danger to the security of the forces and a breakdown in communications with the Far East). He could not, however, promise that the consent of these governments would have to be obtained.

8. I asked him whether he knew of any changes in the military appreciation of the position of the United Nations forces which might qualify the great confidence expressed by General Bradley and others. He said that he was not aware of any alteration of the opinion that the United Nations forces were capable of withstanding, without disaster or serious loss of ground, a heavy offensive by the Communists. It seems apparent, on the other hand, that a major United Nations offensive on the ground no longer is considered a practical possibility. Hickerson remarked that the State Department in its discussions with the Pentagon have long maintained that a cessation of active ground fighting might occur without the conclusion of an armistice; until fairly recently the military authorities had differed because of the necessity in their view of maintaining heavy pressure on the Communist forces; recent experience in the field, however, had led them to revise this military estimate.

Following for the Under-Secretary, Begins:

1. Your messages EX-314 and EX-317 of February 7th on Korean problems crossed my WA-380 of the same day, in which I reported on a discussion with Hickerson on February 6th. Since in this discussion I raised nearly all the points covered in your messages, I think it best to await your comments before going to the State Department again.

2. On the prisoners-of-war issue, I should like some views on the personal suggestion that I made to Hickerson that a distinction in respect of repatriation might be made between Chinese and North Korean prisoners.

3. There is undoubtedly a real risk, if the armistice negotiations break down, that a strong popular demand will arise for some further measures designed to end the war in Korea by military action. A Southern Democrat of no particular importance yesterday introduced a resolution in Congress recommending that in such a case the President should authorize the use of atomic weapons. This possibility was not mentioned in my talk with Hickerson, but I expressed to him grave doubt that other countries with forces in Korea would agree to an extension of the war in such circumstances to Chinese Communist territory. He remarked that it would still be a limited war against China in that there was no intention to use ground forces outside Korea, but he did not disagree when I said that nevertheless a state of war with the Peking Government would exist in such a case without any juridical qualifications and that any limitations on operations would arise solely from military considerations. I also implied that the United States might find itself isolated in such circumstances. A further point which I did not make is that in such an event, governments with forces in Korea might find difficulty in leaving their forces there if the Korean war was expanded into war with China. This is not a matter on which any government can take a definite line at this stage, and I think that all one can do is to seek to ensure that the possible consequences are realized here. I might seek a further discussion, perhaps with Hickerson and either Allison or Johnson of the Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs, sometime next week, when I have received your further comments.

4. I assume that the Chief of the General Staff will be making a report on his recent visit to Korea. It would be helpful to me if I could receive soon his general views on the military situation.

Following from Under-Secretary, Begins: We were most interested in receiving your report of your discussions with Hickerson. I should like, if at all possible, to cable the Minister early next week as full a report as possible of the views of the State Department on the questions raised in our two messages EX 314 and 317<sup>17</sup> of February 7. If you have an opportunity of talking with Mr. Acheson himself so much the better; otherwise I suppose Hickerson and Allison would be appropriate. You will know best about this bearing in mind that we want to be as sure as possible of getting the State Department's considered views to Mr. Pearson on the points he raises.

2. You have already touched on some of the points in question in your conversation with Hickerson. Nevertheless, you will no doubt wish to go over this again since you are now in a position to express the Minister's views as set forth in my two telegrams of February 7.

3. So far as the issue of prisoners of war is concerned, it seems from this distance probable that it will not be possible to get an armistice in Korea unless both sides are willing to compromise on the issue of voluntary versus unconditional repatriation. The formula you suggest has the merit that it provides a possible basis for a compromise. Your formula could, however, be criticized on the ground that the Chinese as well as the Korean prisoners were "willing or unwilling participants in a civil war."

4. Frankly we have not thought of any satisfactory possible compromise on this exceedingly difficult issue of prisoners of war. As you have seen from our telegram No. EX 317, however, Mr. Pearson wanted to be sure that the United States was weighing carefully all the considerations involved, in particular the relationship of the settlement of the issue in Korea to Russian treatment of our prisoners in the event of a major war.

KOREAN PROBLEMS

1. Yesterday afternoon I discussed with Hickerson and Allison the subjects covered in your messages EX-314 and EX-317 of February 7th, and EX-329 of February 9th. The conversation was not productive of much more than the report contained in my message WA-380 of February 7th. I noted a reticence on the part of the State Department officials when we were dealing with the question of policy towards China in the event of a breakdown of armistice negotiations.

Prisoners of War Question

2. The State Department agrees that this very difficult problem may turn out to be a main impediment to conclusion of an armistice, unless a practical answer can be found to the dilemma which now confronts the United Nations. In essence this means that a device must be discovered whereby Chinese and North Korean prisoners who are known to have declared their unwillingness to return to Communist rule should not be forcibly repatriated, while the Communists are not compelled to compromise publicly on the principle of refusing to admit the permissibility of prisoners of war exercising choice in the matter of repatriation. Hickerson wished you to be assured that much earnest thought is being devoted to this problem in an endeavour to seek a way out of the impasse and that the State Department is fully aware of its grave implications both for the prospects of a Korean armistice and for the effects which precedents set now might have on United Nations prisoners of war in any future conflict. One avenue now being explored by the United Nations negotiators at Panmunjom, which was referred to in paragraph 5 of WA-399 of February 9th,† is to dispense with the use of the term voluntary repatriation and to emphasize that under the United Nations proposals all prisoners would be released (although there would not be forced return of POW's). Hickerson pointed out that a serious difficulty was that the Communist authorities could never admit that their prisoners would choose not to be Communists, and therefore the more reasonable the United Nations offer might become in this matter, the more repugnant it would be likely to be to them.

3. Hickerson emphasized the moral issue involved. A large number of Communist prisoners have committed themselves and declared their intention not to return to the Communist rule. The exact numbers are not yet known, but it is possible that among the Chinese the figure may be as high as 10 percent. It is thought that repatriation of these prisoners could only be effected by force and that many would take drastic steps to avoid this eventuality, even to the extent of suicide. The State Department considers that the forced repatriation of these prisoners to face certain harsh reprisals by the Communist authorities would be contrary to United Nations principles and concepts of humanity. Some consideration has been given to my suggestion that a distinction might be made in this matter between Chinese and Korean prisoners. On the other hand, the moral issue is hard to divide in this manner. It is probable that some other solution will have to be attempted, such as accepting the general principle of release and repatriation, but presenting the Communists with a revised list of prisoners of war, deleting the names of those whom it is not intended to repatriate and offering whatever explanation could be devised.

Breakdown in Armistice Negotiations

4. This was the least satisfactory part of our discussion. Hickerson repeated what he had told me at my last meeting with him, that Ridgway's instructions are that he must not be responsible for a breakdown in the armistice negotiations. He declared that the United States wanted an armistice and that it was still hoped that one would be concluded. Allison pointed out that if an armistice were not concluded and fighting of a desultory nature continued indefinitely, a serious political problem would be posed to the administration because of public pressure to do something to put an end to the casualties being suffered in Korea.

5. At this point I stressed your view that relatively few people in most of the Western countries would consider a breakdown in the armistice negotiations which did not result from a mass attack from the enemy would justify the United Nations taking the initiative to extend the war. Hickerson observed that in reality we are at war now with China and the question is what, in the circumstances, is the wisest policy to adopt towards China. I made mention of public references which have been made here to a "more positive policy towards China," and expressed the opinion that as far as the MacArthur policy towards China was concerned, most of the Western allies would probably regard it as having even less validity now than a year ago, and that they would not be willing to subscribe to it. I said that to us the policy of limiting the war in Korea still made sense and we would certainly wish to be consulted if there were any danger of the war spreading. To Hickerson's semi-jocular question whether the allies would be willing to provide more troops for Korea, so as to offset any need for the war being carried to China, I replied that a more likely result of extension of the war to China, except in a clear case of renewal of major aggression by China, might be that some governments would remove their forces from Korea.

Approach to Soviet Union

6. The United States is still considering the possibility of secretly sounding out the Soviet Union at some appropriate time regarding a political settlement in Korea. The State Department, however, maintains its objection to doing this before conclusion of an armistice, lest opportunity be given the Soviet to increase the Communists pressure on the United Nations armistice delegation to get involved in political matters.

7. The State Department position on post-armistice procedures remains as we have reported. Present thinking is that the General Assembly resolution should note with approval the conclusion of an armistice and probably should take note of the warning declaration to be issued by governments with forces in Korea. The resolution should then provide for the establishment of a United Nations Commission to enter into political discussions with all interested governments and authorities. The State Department believes it would be necessary for the resolution to contain a brief statement of the terms of reference of the commission (e.g. unified, independent and democratic Korea, etc). Consideration is now being given to such matters as the negotiating Commission's composition and terms of reference. Hickerson repeated what he had previously told us, that State Department views on the contents of the General Assembly resolution are still tentative and flexible.

Objectives of Political Settlement in Korea

8. Hickerson said that we would almost certainly have to be satisfied in practice with a divided Korea. He agrees that it might be doubtful whether the achievement of a unified, independent and democratic Korea at this time would be to our interests, but he regards this problem as somewhat academic, since the State Department does not believe that political discussions at the present time can result in a mutually satisfactory solution of the Korean problem. It is for this reason that the United Nations delegation is attempting to draft the armistice agreement in terms which, if lived up to, could protect the United Nations position in South Korea indefinitely.

9. Hickerson asked me if I could give him the text of those parts of the telegrams under reference which dealt with the possible dangers of admitting that all prisoners ought not to be repatriated and with the objectives of a political settlement in Korea. I have sent him paragraphs 3 to 7 of EX-317 and 8 to 11 of EX-314. I also drew his attention to the article "beyond Korea" in The Manchester Guardian Weekly of January 31st, and read extracts from it.

KOREA — POST ARMISTICE PROCEDURES

Addressed External Ottawa WA-485, repeated Permdel New York No. 67.

1. A discussion yesterday with Ward Allen and Henkin of Hickerson's staff and Arthur Emmons of the Northeast Asian Affairs Office revealed that there has been some change in State Department views on procedures which might be followed in the United Nations after an armistice in Korea. This change has been brought about by the outcome of the negotiations at Panmunjom on Item 5 of the agenda (recommendations to governments).

2. Plenary delegations at Panmunjom have now reached agreement that the respective military commanders should recommend to governments that within three months after an armistice is concluded a high-level political conference of both sides should be held to settle through negotiation "the questions of the withdrawal of all foreign forces from Korea, the peaceful settlement of the Korean question, etc."

3. In the State Department view this is a virtual commitment to a political conference on Korea, from which it would be both difficult and unwise to attempt to escape. The State Department is therefore considering how this requirement can be met, in terms of procedures in the United Nations. The original idea of a United Nations negotiating commission does not seem to be appropriate for this purpose.

4. In view of this development the State Department now appears ready to accept the idea of the United Nations sitting down at a conference table on Korean affairs with the Chinese Communist Government as well as with the North Korean Government. It is now considered that the General Assembly resolution on post-armistice procedures should either:

(a) Appoint a United Nations delegation, rather than a commission, which might both arrange for a political conference on Korea and participate in it; or

(b) Request certain United Nations Governments, presumably governments most directly concerned, and the ROK Government to take part in a political conference on Korea. In this case there would be no United Nations delegation as such.

5. The State Department has come to no firm opinion as to which of these alternative methods might be followed, but officials appear to favour the former. They are now working on a draft of a General Assembly resolution which might be used in this case, and they have undertaken to make it available to us when it has been completed. The draft might follow similar lines to those set out in paragraph 3 of my WA-4285† of December 22nd, with the exception that the resolution would appoint a delegation rather than a commission and that there would be no mention of the abolition of UNCURK (which it is now thought might be kept alive). Terms of reference for the delegation might be

- (1) To try<sup>18</sup> to achieve a unified independent and democratic Korea.
- (2) Deal with other Korean questions such as withdrawal of foreign troops.
- (3) Report to the General Assembly.

6. The State Department considers that a United Nations delegation to a political conference on Korea should speak with one voice. It might therefore be advantageous for the chairman of the delegation to be appointed in weekly rotation and to speak on behalf of the United Nations delegation after an agreed-upon position has been reached. If the course were followed of having the General Assembly request specific governments as such to participate in a political conference on Korea, the State Department believes that the General Assembly should still do its best to control proceedings by establishing in some way terms of reference for governments concerned.

7. The State Department is giving consideration to the question of possible participation of the Soviet Union in the conference on Korea. Officials point out that the Communist negotiators at Panmunjom themselves have not suggested that the Soviet Union should take part in a political conference on Korea. The Communist proposal on Item 5 appears to imply that the conference should be between representatives of belligerent governments. On the other hand, the State Department has not closed its mind to the possibility of Soviet participation in a conference, either as a member of a United Nations delegation or as one of the interested governments which might be requested directly by the General Assembly to take part in the conference on Korea. At first glance there would appear to be a certain amount of difficulty in inviting the Soviet Union to be a member of the United Nations delegation sent to such a conference.

8. On the question of possible Soviet participation, the only firm view that the State Department appears to have arrived at is that if the Soviet Union expressed a strong desire to take part in some manner in a political conference on Korea, the State Department would consider it unrealistic to attempt to prevent this. State Department views on secretly sounding out the Russians on contemplated post-armistice procedures have not changed. They remain opposed to doing this before the conclusion of an armistice, but still consider that an approach of this sort might be made after an armistice.

9. As to participants on the United Nations side in a political conference on Korea, the State Department is inclined to think that these should be governments with forces in Korea, with the possible exception of the Soviet not to be a sticking point.

Union. The State Department would be opposed to participation of India or Arab bloc representatives.<sup>19</sup>

10. With regard to the possible results of a political conference in Korea, the State Department continues to doubt that political discussions at the present time can result in a mutually satisfactory solution of the Korean problem. Nevertheless, the Department is prepared to make the effort in good faith and believes that the United States should participate in such a conference with reasonable proposals.

11. The State Department will have more information for us on this whole matter when their views have become further clarified. In the meantime they would appreciate our comments on their views regarding post-armistice procedures, in the light of the outcome of negotiations on Item 5 of the agenda at Panmunjom.

12. My immediately following telegram gives the texts of the Communist proposal on Item 5 of the agenda, submitted at plenary session on February 16, and of the United Nations Command explanatory statement accepting the Communist proposal.†

KOREA — POST-ARMISTICE PROCEDURES

Reference: WA-485 of February 20.

1. The State Department have now expressed their tentative views on procedures which might be followed in the United Nations, after an armistice in Korea, in two draft resolutions:

- (a) Proposed Security Council resolution;
- (b) Proposed General Assembly resolution;

the texts of which are given in my immediately following teletypes.

2. In giving us these texts today, Ward Allen and Arthur Emmons stressed that they represented only working papers which have not been given any senior official approval in the Department of State. These texts were given to us for our comment. At this early stage only the United Kingdom, France, Australia and New Zealand are also being consulted.

India & U.S.S.R. sh[oul]d be in somehow.

3. Your attention is drawn to two points in the draft text of the Assembly resolution. The second paragraph of Part II refers only in general terms to the Panmunjom recommendation regarding the holding of a political conference for Korea. The next paragraph requests certain designated United Nations member governments to arrange and participate in such a conference "on behalf of the United Nations". In handing us this text, Ward Allen explained that as an alternative some consideration had been given to quoting the Panmunjom recommendation, which would make it clear that the conference would include representatives from "both sides" and that the Assembly resolution merely designated certain United Nations member governments as participants "on behalf of the United Nations." The other side would then be free to designate its representatives to this conference. The text as presently drafted, with its general reference to the Panmunjom recommendation in the second paragraph, perhaps does not make it sufficiently clear that there is to be participation by "both sides".

4. You will also observe that in the Assembly resolution there is a sentence in brackets which reads "invites the government of the U.S.S.R. to participate in the conference." It was explained to us that this sentence has been put in brackets because it is contemplated to sound out the Russians before the resolution is submitted in the Assembly and, depending upon the Soviet reaction, this sentence would be included or excluded from the text. It was emphasized, however, that the Russians would not be approached before an armistice is concluded.

5. Your early comments on these texts would be appreciated.

KOREA: PRISONERS OF WAR

I should consider it unfortunate if the armistice talks were to break down over prisoners of war. I think it is obvious from the paragraphs of EX-317 of Feb. 7, which you showed to the State Department, that I am not altogether convinced that the course presently being followed by the United Nations Command at Panmunjom is the wise one. However, before going any further with the State Department, I should like to know whether any other of the interested countries in Korea has expressed views on this matter to the United States. I am sending enquiries to London and Canberra to find out if they have raised the question with the United States and should be grateful if you would try to find out from the State Department if any other country has made an approach.

2. At the same time it would be interesting to know whether the State Department thinks that any Chinese prisoners of war who might elect not to be repatriated would be accepted on Formosa by Chiang Kai-shek. Similarly, would North Korean prisoners who elected not to be repatriated be accepted by the government of South Korea? If the answer to either of these questions is negative, or that the State Department does not know, I should like to know just what they plan with any prisoners who are not repatriated. Such information as we have here suggests that Chiang-Kai-shek would not allow Chinese prisoners to go to Formosa, and it is further our estimate that Chinese prisoners of war who were returned to Chinese hands would be unlikely to suffer unduly. The reason for this estimate is that a great many of the Chinese "volunteers" were Nationalists who defected wholesale to the Chinese Communists. Having fought against the Communists and been accepted by them once there does not appear to be much reason to assume that they would not receive the same treatment again. It is difficult to be sure that the Chinese prisoners are men of great principle rather than opportunists.

3. I should like your advice on what should be done in regard to the present position of the United States and the United Nations Command re voluntary repatriation. At the moment I am inclined to think that if we put pressure on the United States government, that government might be inclined later to defend itself from criticism by saying that it yielded to pressure from its allies. You will recall that this was one of the reasons used by the United States government in the MacArthur hearings<sup>20</sup> to explain why "hot pursuit" had been abandoned. The question is whether the pressure of that public opinion which wants to get United States prisoners back home counter-balances that public opinion which wants to keep prisoners who have waived their right to repatriation out of Communist hands.

KOREA: POST-ARMISTICE NEGOTIATIONS

Reference: Your messages WA-510, 511 and 512 of February 22.

I have been thinking about the ideas put forward in your telegrams under reference and other related messages, and have come to the conclusion that I cannot yet make detailed comments on the proposals put forward by the State Department. You may pass on the following preliminary comments, together with an assurance that I shall look forward to seeing Mr. Acheson and possibly discussing these points further when I come to Washington.

2. In any resolution which comes before the United Nations, and indeed in all our future negotiations for a political settlement in Korea, we have to be careful not to disavow the past actions of the United Nations or to seem to fall in with the Soviet and Chinese thesis that the actions of the United Nations in the summer of 1950 were illegal: they were not illegal or improper in any way. Nevertheless, if reference back to those actions will jeopardize the chance of a political settlement of the Korean war, I think we should have sufficient confidence in the propriety of our past actions to be able to omit another reference to them.

3. I say this on the assumption that secret diplomatic soundings will have shown that the Soviet Union is willing to co-operate in bringing about a political conference on reasonable terms, and that is really the crux of the matter. There is no real point in discussing the details of resolutions which may be put before the Security Council or the General Assembly until we know what the attitude of the Soviet Union will be. A resolution such as that in WA-512 should be put forward only if secret soundings show that the Soviet Union will not co-operate under a resolution which does not refer to past action. In my view, consultation with the Soviet Union is sufficiently important that I am thinking of suggesting to Eden that he should have Jebb speak to Malik without waiting to be asked by the United States to do so. Eden, of course, would not act without telling the United States that he meant to do so, but there really is no reason why the initiative can come only from the United States. (The preceding two sentences are for your own information only.)

4. There are two remarks about the State Department plan which you may pass on, in addition to the foregoing general comment. First, I think that it would be unwise to provide for a conference on Korea without Indian participation. All other considerations aside, it will appear that the United States is showing pique for what it regards as a lukewarm attitude on the part of India. Secondly, while I agree that the General Assembly should select a few representative states to take part in the conference, I think it would be unwise to look upon those states as a United Nations delegation to speak with one voice. There will be differences of approach among them, and the United Nations "delegation" to the political conference will not be able to function like the "United Nations" delegation to the armistice talks.

1. I conveyed your preliminary views on the State Department's tentative proposals to Hickerson today, saying that you would wish to discuss these matters further when in Washington next week. His initial reactions may be of some interest.

2. He appeared to be sympathetic toward the argument in your paragraph 2. I did not press him further on the question of a secret approach to the Soviet Union at this time, but he left me with the impression that if the Soviet Union were later found to be willing to accept a resolution which did not refer to the past actions of the United Nations but established a satisfactory basis for a political conference, he would probably favour this course.

3. The State Department sees serious difficulties in including India in a Korean conference. Hickerson said that the reports by Bowles<sup>21</sup> of discussions with the Indian Government left him with the impression that India in any case would be unwilling to serve, although the question had not been put directly in New Delhi. He stated that the position here towards Indian participation was not in any way caused by India's lukewarm attitude. The reason for it is that unless representation at the conference is limited to governments with forces in Korea (plus perhaps the Soviet Union), there will be demands for membership from the Arab bloc, possibly Nationalist China, and others. In the armistice negotiations agreement had been reached on a recommendation that "both sides" should participate in a conference, and the Communists apparently regarded this as meaning governments with forces in Korea.

4. The State Department now considers that Colombia should be one of the countries designated, as the only Latin American country which has provided troops, thus raising the representation of United Nations members to seven.

5. Hickerson agreed that in such a conference the United Nations side could not be expected always to speak with one voice. It was hoped, however, that the governments concerned and their representatives at the conference would consult together before the conference began and aim at reaching a general agreement on the strategy and tactics to be employed. It is to be expected that the Communist side will be intractable, and this in itself should help to make the United Nations side cohesive.

KOREA — PRISONERS OF WAR

1. We discussed today with Alexis Johnson the points made in your message EX-457 of March 3rd.

2. The Korean Government has been consulted by the United States concerning the disposition of North Korean prisoners who would not wish to be repatriated, and the ROK Government has stated its willingness to accept them. Johnson said that during his recent journey to Korea he had been very impressed by the rapidity with which North Korean refugees had been accepted and assimilated in South Korea. He referred to the fact that this had been a continuing process and that several hundred thousand refugees from

Chester Bowles, Ambassador of United States in India.

North Korea moved into South Korea during the period 1945-50. Some of these persons are now in prominent positions in political life in the republic.

3. The Chinese Government in Formosa has not been approached by the United States Government with respect to Chinese prisoners not wishing to be repatriated to Communist China. The Chinese Nationalists, however, have given voluntary although informal indications that the Nationalist Government would be glad to accept such Chinese personnel, subject to screening. George Yeh, the Chinese Nationalist Foreign Minister, stated publicly on February 25th that non-Communist Chinese soldiers captured by United Nations forces in Korea would be welcomed into the forces "to participate in the work of anti-Communism." Johnson said the United States did not welcome a public statement of this sort because of its possible harmful effects on the armistice negotiations. The State Department regards the disposition of the Chinese prisoners of war who do not wish to return to Communist rule as a much more sensitive question than that of North Koreans in a similar category. The United States does not wish to acerbate the Formosa situation by suggesting to the Chiang Kai-shek Government that it provide for the acceptance on Formosa of Chinese prisoners of war held by the United Nations in Korea. The State Department would be interested to know the origin of the information you have received which suggests that Chiang Kai-Shek would not permit Chinese prisoners to go to Formosa, since this conflicts with reports received by the department.

4. Discussing the position of former Nationalists amongst the Chinese prisoners of war, who had defected wholesale to the Communists, Johnson argued that the manner in which these prisoners had fallen into United Nations hands was not the same as that in which they had come under Communist rule. Most of them had come under Communist rule not by volition or by the exercise of individual choice, but as a result of mass surrender on the part of large units. The majority of Chinese prisoners taken by the United Nations in Korea, however, surrendered individually and many of these have now indicated not only a choice but a determination not to return to Communist rule. A large number of Chinese prisoners, who must be assumed by their actions to have been anti-Communist all along, have since their capture been of considerable service to the United Nations Command by such means as cooperating in intelligence work and camp administration. In other words, a proportion of the Chinese prisoners have by their acts committed themselves as anti-Communists and are known to have done so. It is thought that these people would take extreme measures to avoid being sent back to inevitable reprisals by Communist authorities. Johnson cited the frequent mass executions now taking place in China as evidence that the Communist authorities would not be likely to take the trouble to have a second attempt at indoctrinating these prisoners if they again came into their hands.

5. Johnson pointed out that it was very difficult to determine precisely those prisoners who would go to any lengths to avoid repatriation, before the time of decision came. Tentative estimates, however, place in this category 4,000 to 5,000 North Koreans out of the 96,000 North Korean prisoners held and approximately 11,000 out of the 20,000 Chinese prisoners. Johnson said he personally thought that the estimate of Chinese prisoners might be a little high. In any case he agreed that the aim of the United Nations Command would be to reduce to the minimum the number of prisoners who it was considered could not be returned to the Communists.

6. As to tactics on the prisoner of war question, Johnson repeated what he had told us on February 25th (see my WA-525).† The United Nations delegation would attempt to obtain a practical compromise on the prisoner of war question in return for United Nations concessions in the matter of airfield inspection. If this should prove impossible, it might be necessary to confront the Communists with a fait accompli by simply releasing a certain number of prisoners and taking their names off the POW lists. Johnson confirmed that if this has to be done, the State Department does not think that trickery should be employed. If names are deleted from United Nations prisoner of war lists, both the International Red Cross and the Communist authorities should be notified. Johnson thought it possible that ultimately the Communists might accept a fait accompli of this sort provided that they knew they were going to get back a large majority of their prisoners (e.g. over 100,000 of the 116,000 Communist prisoners held). It was hoped that Communist acquiescence in this might be aided by the United Nations having dropped the idea of voluntary repatriation in the armistice negotiations (taking the stand rather that there should be no forced repatriation). If the Communists accepted the fait accompli the United Nations could then go on record as agreeing to general repatriation.

7. As to public opinion in this country, Johnson thought that it had not really come to grips with the prisoners of war problem, possibly because there are other contentious issues which delay the conclusion of an armistice. Johnson thought that in so far as there had been expressions of public opinion on the matter, they had in general approved the United Nations position against forced repatriation. He hazarded a personal opinion that even if a breakdown of the armistice talks on the POW repatriation question were threatened, American public opinion would for the most part regard forced repatriation of prisoners held by the United Nations as payment of ransom to the Communists for United States prisoners and would not acquiesce in it. This opinion seems to me somewhat surprising but much would depend I suppose upon how the issue were presented to the public.

8. I agree with you that, if strong representations were made by friendly governments to the effect that the United States should abandon its objections to compulsory repatriation, this would very likely be used as a defence by the administration against public criticism. Before considering the advisability of taking action of this sort, I think perhaps that we might await development of the United Nations tactics at Panmunjom and the clarification of public opinion. Johnson said that other governments concerned have not expressed views to the United States on the prisoners of war question.

Following from Under-Secretary, Begins: The Minister has decided that, on the whole, he prefers that Canada be left out of any slate of countries which might participate in a post-armistice conference on Korea. Washington, March 11, 1952

MR. ACHESON'S VIEWS ON ARMISTICE NEGOTIATIONS IN KOREA<sup>22</sup>

1. In the course of discussion after dinner at the Embassy last night between Mr. Acheson, Mr. Pearson, Mr. Freeman Matthews and myself, Mr. Acheson said that in his judgement the time had come to end the type of negotiations with the Communists in Korea which have been going on now for some eight months. The tempers and nerves of the negotiators were frayed, and the public would not take much more of this sort of thing. He was therefore supporting — and he implied with the approval of the President — an offer from the Unified Command which would deal in one package with the four outstanding points of difference now remaining. This offer might perhaps be presented by General Ridgway in person, and might be preceded by a proposal from General Ridgway that he should meet with the Communist Field Commanders.

2. The offer would deal with the following points of difference:

(a) Inspection at Ports of Entry. The present difference was between seven ports of entry for inspection requested by the United Nations command and five proposed by the Communists. A compromise on six should not present difficulties.

(b) Organ for Observation of the Armistice. The Communist demand that the Soviet Union should be represented on a “neutral” organ should be sidestepped by offering to set up an organ on which would serve representatives of three countries chosen by each side, and the designation of the organ as neutral should be dropped. This would permit the Soviet Union to serve without being labelled a neutral, together with representatives of two satellite countries.

(c) Prisoners of War. This was the most difficult question in dispute. On the United Nations side repatriation of unwilling prisoners at bayonet-point could not be accepted. The Convention of 1949 had not been drafted with a situation of this sort in mind and could not be literally applied. Most of the Communist prisoners in the United Nations' hands would be quite ready to be repatriated, but the minority — and no-one knew how large it really was — could not be forced back. For the idea of voluntary repatriation put forward originally on the U.N. side, there had been substituted in the negotiations the idea of no forcible repatriation. This the Communists would have to accept. It might be covered over to some extent by reclassification of prisoners in U.N. hands, a practice which the Communists have themselves indulged in freely.

(d) Airfield Construction. In return for agreement on the other points, General Ridgway would waive the demand for a prohibition on airfield construction during the armistice.

3. Mr. Acheson suggested that this offer should be made as a firm and final offer. When it was first presented, it might be handed to the Communists, and they might be told that an immediate answer was not expected, but that a further meeting would be held in a week. If they came back with further bargaining, they could be again told that the offer was final, but that they could have more time to think over it if they wished. Mr. Pearson indicated that this procedure seemed to him to have merit.

4. Mr. Acheson repeated the confident views previously expressed on the morale of the U.N. forces and on their capacity to resist a renewed Communist offensive. He said, indeed, that such an offensive would be welcome to the troops, as it would bring the Communists out of their positions into the open.

5. In the course of discussion he expressed doubt on the wisdom of ratifying the Convention of 1949 on prisoners of war, based as it was on the experience of the two World Wars and being ill adapted to situations other than victory in the field.

6. The conversation then turned from the entanglements in Korea to the morass in Indo-China, and the discussion on the situation there added nothing to what we already know.

KOREA: POST-ARMISTICE CONFERENCE

As you probably know from papers referred to you, we have expressed the view to the State Department that India ought to be included among those invited to any post-armistice conference on Korea. The State Department doubts whether India would take part in a conference limited to Korean questions. Would you please approach Bajpai informally and with the greatest discretion and find out, without revealing the reason for your inquiry, if India would be willing to take part in a conference of this sort.

I saw Bajpai this noon on several topics. In the course of the conversation on prospects in Korea, after mentioning the provisional agreement at Panmunjom for a post-armistice political conference, I asked him whether India had expressed herself on composition of such a conference. He replied that at the Prime Minister's Conference, India had proposed that parties to a post-armistice conference should be the Big Five which I presume would include Communist rather than Nationalist China and at least two other countries. India, he said, had not, repeat not, mentioned names of these two other countries but those they had in mind were Canada and India. My reference to Panmunjom provisional agreement, restricted as latter was to Korea, did not, repeat not, lead him to suggest that India's earlier proposal should not now be modified; and I went no further.

KOREA — POST-ARMISTICE PROCEDURES

Reference: WA-627 of March 5th, repeated to Permdel, New York as No. 88.

Addressed External as WA-817, repeated to Permdel, New York as No. 117.

1. The State Department have now come to a point of view in general accord with that expressed in your message EX-466 of March 4th. They agree that the Soviet Union should be sounded out regarding post-armistice procedures and Soviet participation in a conference for a political settlement and that the form of the United Nations resolutions on Korea should depend upon Soviet reactions.

2. To this end the State Department have re-drafted their proposed Security Council and General Assembly resolutions so as to remove tendentious sections which would be unacceptable to the Soviet Union. The new proposed draft resolutions were handed to us today by Ward Allen and Henkin of Hickerson's office and the texts are given in my immediately following teletypes WA-818 and WA-819. The draft of the General Assembly resolution is very close to the United Kingdom draft as given in EX-474 of March 4th.† Allen explained that the United States would regard these resolutions as an interim measure designed to expedite the holding of a political conference on Korea and would consider that "the record should be made clear" after the conference had been held. The terms of the final resolutions would of course depend upon the outcome of the conference.

3. The State Department believe that the Soviet Union might be approached before actual signature of an armistice in Korea, but they would not agree to this move being made prior to agreement between the delegations at Panmunjom on all substantive matters in the armistice negotiations. They have come to no firm views as to the method by which preliminary soundings of the Soviet Union should be carried out.

4. The United States would be willing that the temperate resolutions should be put forward if the Soviet reaction to preliminary soundings should be favourable or possibly even if it should be noncommittal. If the Soviet reaction should be unfavourable the United States would wish to see the resolutions stiffened in accordance with their previous drafts. Paragraphs which the State Department would seek to have included in the General Assembly resolution in the event of Soviet refusal to participate in the post-armistice negotiations are set out in my following message WA-822.

5. In the United States view, Soviet participation in a post-armistice Korean settlement is desirable but not essential. State Department officials continue to be very sceptical of the results of the proposed political conference on Korea.

6. I should be grateful to have your comments on the new United States proposals for action in the United Nations in the event of an armistice in Korea.

The scheme outlined in your telegrams under reference is most gratifying and I have no hesitation in accepting it almost without change. The only suggestions I have to make at present relate to the General Assembly resolution in WA-819.

2. I am, as I said earlier, doubtful about the inclusion of Colombia among the negotiating powers. I realize the desire of the United States to recognize Colombia's contribution of a battalion and to avoid appearing to slight its Latin American allies, but I do not think that the mustering of Colombia, Thailand and Turkey looks very good. Secondly, I still think that India, as a party at interest, ought to be invited to the conference. Soundings in Delhi indicate that the limited scope of the conference would not deter India from attending. I should be grateful if you would bring these two points on the composition of the conference to the attention of the State Department and again urge that India be invited. I am asking Australia and the United Kingdom to support this approach.

3. In the terms of reference for the governments acting on behalf of the United Nations, sub-paragraph A nearly but not quite follows the wording of the agreement on Item 5 of the agenda at Panmunjom. I consider, however, that it means the same thing and that agreeing in the General Assembly to amend the resolution to follow the wording of the agreement on Item 5 would be a harmless concession to make if the Soviet Union requests it. I think that this is a comment you might mention in passing.

4. The final paragraph in your WA-819 obviously refers to UNKRA but, unless we have received it in corrupt form, there is no mention of the agency by name. This the State Department will no doubt wish to correct.

1. The comments made in your message EX-660 of March 27th were passed on today to Ward Allen and Kenkin [Henkin] of Hickerson's office. They undertook to convey your views to Hickerson and other appropriate senior officials.

2. They thought there might be some difficulty about not including Colombia among the negotiating powers, not only for political reasons but also because they believed that informal conversations had already taken place with high Colombian officials about the possibility of Colombia's participation in the political conference on Korea.

3. They said that the question of Indian participation in the conference would be looked at again in the light of the additional information received from you. They thought there would be considerable opposition in the State Department to extending an invitation to India on the grounds that the conference should as far as possible be restricted to governments participating in the Korean war; a position which they claim is implied in the Communist proposals regarding Item 5 of the armistice. We urged that the principle would in any case be broken by an invitation to the Soviet Union, and India should be invited as an interested and important Asian power. I have the impression that United States reluctance to invite India stems from fear that India may cause trouble at a political conference on Korea by attempting to play a "third hand".

4. With regard to the point made in paragraph 3 of your message, State Department officials consider it appropriate that the terms of reference for the governments acting on behalf of the United Nations should differ in emphasis from the wording of the agreement on Item 5 of the armistice agenda. In particular, it was not desirable to retain in the United Nations resolution the awkward and ambiguous word "et cetera". Furthermore, it seemed preferable to word the terms of reference in such a way as to place emphasis on consistently held United Nations principles regarding Korea rather than such matters as withdrawal of troops.

5. State Department officials said there would be no objection to the naming of UNKRA in the final paragraph of the General Assembly resolution (as suggested in paragraph 4 of your message).

2. While themselves continuing at the official level to take the same view as yourself, they have not made any further attempt to persuade the State Department since the time of their first sounding in Washington. At that time the preliminary view of the State Department "off the record" was that India would seek to widen the scope of the conference to cover other Far Eastern issues.

3. On being told this, we indicated that there was evidence to the contrary. John Lloyd said that on March 7 Sir Archibald Nye had given an opinion that India would not insist on an invitation and that in the present state of Indian policy he would prefer not to press the matter in New Delhi.

PROBLEMS CONNECTED WITH THE WAR IN KOREA

1. There are three aspects of the problem of Korea which you might discuss with the State Department. The first is that, even if there appears to be no prospect of an armistice coming from further negotiations, and no matter how empty the formality of further meetings might become, we would hope, as I know they hope in Washington, that the talks should not be broken off by the United Nations side. The Communist negotiators have obviously been trying to force the U.N. representatives into this position. The analogy I have in mind here is that of the negotiations towards an Austrian peace treaty. The responsibility for breaking off the talks, if they are broken off, must lie with the enemy. In this connection we are concerned with the repeated public quotations of Admiral Joy to the effect that the package proposal is "final" etc., about which I have telegraphed you separately.

2. Secondly, and this is related to my first point, we consider that a de facto cease-fire on the ground is preferable to a renewal of hostilities on the ground. If the talks remain deadlocked as envisaged in my preceding paragraph, or even if they are completely broken off, surely it would not be wise for the United Nations side to take the initiative on the ground. The State Department may refer to the informal discussions of last September in which we agreed that the United Nations forces might undertake small tactical advances which, when added together, would amount to a creeping advance to the neck of Korea above Pyongyang. When we gave our consent to such advances, we did so on the basis of two arguments: that action was necessary to keep the enemy off balance and unable to launch an attack, and that action was necessary to maintain the morale of our own troops. By United States estimates, the enemy is now in a position to launch attacks if he so wishes, and the morale of our own troops seems to have been sustained even though there has for several months now been a virtual cease-fire on the ground. The situation has, therefore, changed somewhat from September. Therefore it might well be that the present holding operation is preferable to a renewal of any action on the ground. The problem of morale for the troops during an indefinite stalemate in Korea would be serious. However, fighting for merely tactical advances might itself add to the problem of morale. In any case, we certainly could not agree to any major offensive without prior consultation on the political level and in sufficient time to permit our views to be considered seriously.

3. Thirdly, there is a point to be made about consultation. Consultation after an initiative has been taken, or consultation too late to permit the initiative to be altered, is not really consultation at all. For instance, the way in which the instruction to General Ridgway about the package proposal was handled was not satisfactory from our point of view. We do not question the explanation that the instruction to Ridgway, based on the view of ourselves, the United Kingdom and others, telling him to take the emphasis off the finality of the package proposal, did not arrive in time, but the fact that it did not arrive in time is an indication of the unsatisfactory character of the consultation. The events of the last few months have amply demonstrated, it seems to me, the overriding need for secrecy if the negotiations are to be at all fruitful. When the U.S. army discovered that significantly large numbers of prisoners held by the United Nations did not wish to be repatriated, this fact should have been communicated to the Allied powers concerned for whatever counsel they might wish to give, but should it not have been kept secret? It is surely obvious that once this fact was broadcast to the world the other side would make a major issue of it. I believe we were quite right in treating it as a moral question, but am doubtful of the wisdom of attempting to exploit it as a propaganda weapon. The former consideration would not be inconsistent with secrecy. On the contrary, it could be better treated on its own merits when it was kept secret; the second consideration seems to have been a factor in making it public and, once this had been done, it was obviously difficult for the Chinese to give in without serious loss of face. In this connection I would draw your attention to an editorial on the subject in the Economist for May 10 which concludes as follows:

“Meanwhile the eagerness of propaganda organizations to exploit the refusal of Chinese and North Koreans to return home must not be allowed to make negotiation more difficult. Peace in Korea is more important than points scored over the radio.”

4. It is, of course, easy with the benefit of hindsight to criticize this or that point in the handling of the negotiations. It would obviously have been better, for instance, if the United Nations side had not given the Communists, as they did, the nominal role of prisoners held by the U.N. This is the kind of mistake, however, which one can overlook because it was made in a situation which was completely new in the modern international scene. I cannot feel, however, that we should let the other points raised in this telegram pass without comment if our relations on this matter with the United States in the future are to be maintained on the frank and helpful basis that we desire.

ORAL MESSAGE

Even if there appears to be no prospect of an armistice being concluded as a result of further negotiations, and no matter how empty the formality of further meetings may become, the Canadian Government considers — and it is believed that this view is shared in Washington — that the talks should not be broken off by the United Nations Command. The Communist negotiators obviously are trying to force the U.N. representatives into this position. If the talks, however, are broken off, the responsibility should clearly lie with the enemy.

In this connection concern is felt over repeated public references by Admiral Joy and others to the finality of the package proposal which was put to the Communist delegation on April 28th. It will be recalled that the original draft of the public statement issued by General Ridgway on May 6th referred to the proposal as “final and absolute”, and that this was modified after representations had been made by the Canadian and other governments that less restrictive language should be used. Furthermore, on May 2nd the Canadian Embassy was informed by the State Department that instructions had been sent to the United Nations Command that its representatives should refrain from making frequent use of such words as “final” and “irrevocable” during the negotiations. Since then, however, a number of reports have appeared in the press on various dates quoting statements by Admiral Joy about the finality of the offer. For example, an Associated Press despatch from Munsan of May 14th quotes him as saying in an open session at Panmunjom, “There is one fact that you are not willing to face or do not understand: the United Nations Command’s compromise proposal is firm, final and irrevocable.” It would appear that not a great deal of attention has been paid by the United Nations negotiators to the instructions that frequent use should not be made of language such as this. Its reiteration might well create the impression that the United Nations side is preparing the public for breaking off the talks altogether, and has for that purpose presented the Communists with an ultimatum.

It can be understood that in the course of the extremely difficult negotiations with the Communists the U.N. negotiators may find it desirable at times to emphasize in private that their offer is not susceptible to bargaining. It is a different thing, however, to repeat this frequently in public statements, especially in view of the opinions which have been expressed by the Canadian and some other governments.

If the armistice talks remain deadlocked or even if they are completely broken off, the Canadian Government considers that it would not be wise for the United Nations forces to take the initiative in resorting to more active operations on the ground. The present military situation, which approaches for the ground forces a de facto cease-fire, is considered to be preferable to a renewal of larger scale operations. Several months ago arguments were advanced that continuous ground action was necessary to keep the enemy off balance and unable to launch an attack, and that active operations were necessary to maintain the morale of the United Nations troops. This estimate seems to be no longer valid, since on the one hand the enemy is now considered to be in a position to launch an offensive if he so desires, and on the other hand the morale of the United Nations troops appears to have been sustained even though offensive operations on a scale larger than patrols have been discontinued for a considerable time. Should there be an indefinite stalemate in Korea, the problem of morale for the troops might well become serious, but a renewal of more active fighting merely for tactical advances might itself add to this problem.

In any case the Canadian Government could not agree to the undertaking of a major offensive by the United Nations forces without prior consultation on the political level in time to permit Canadian views to be seriously considered.

Parliamentary and public opinion in Canada and elsewhere is obviously being influenced by the diminished prospects for an armistice, by the recent deplorable incidents on Koje Island, and especially by concern about the future course of operations if no armistice is concluded. It is therefore particularly important in the present situation in Korea that there should be frequent consultation between the Government of the United States and other governments mainly concerned in the Korean operations, and that consultation should take place at as early a stage as possible before proposals for new initiatives have begun to harden into decisions.

PROBLEMS CONNECTED WITH THE WAR IN KOREA

Reference: My despatch 1196 of May 21st.

1. I left with Messrs. Hickerson and Johnson yesterday afternoon the informal memorandum enclosed with my despatch, and had a lengthy conversation with them.

2. They repeated the assurances previously given that there is no present discussion or thought of breaking off the armistice negotiations. Certainly there would be no question of the negotiations being broken off by the United Nations side without prior consultation with governments concerned, and General Clark had no authority to terminate the negotiations without approval of Washington.

3. They drew a clear distinction, however, between breaking off the negotiations and suspending them for a period. Admiral Joy has expressed the strong opinion that indefinite continuation of the type of meetings now taking place is undesirable tactically — a view with which it is easy to agree. He had recommended that the United Nations Command should suspend the discussions on the understanding that they would be prepared at any time to resume sessions when the Communists should have something constructive to propose or in order further to explain the package proposal. The State Department considers that the Communists are improving their propaganda position during the present plenary sessions at which matters of substance are not being discussed. They have been greatly assisted by the Kojé incidents, and they are able to give free rein to their fancy, while the United Nations spokesmen must adhere to the facts.

4. Apart from the propaganda aspects, the State Department appears to favour suspension of the discussions in an endeavour to remove any possible thought in the minds of the Communists that the United Nations Command might recede from its position on the package proposal. Hickerson recalled how the Communists maintained adamantly for months that they could not abandon their demands for the 38th Parallel as a military demarcation line, although subsequently they did so. He suggested they might now be hoping for a similar eventual retreat on the part of the United Nations Command with regard to the package proposal.

5. I emphasized the objections to Admiral Joy's repeated public use of language indicating the finality of the United Nations proposal. The State Department officials did not seem very receptive on this point. I infer that there may have been a change of mind about it and there are doubts whether the use of such language is objectionable as a matter of tactics in present circumstances.

6. Hickerson and Johnson said that no consideration is now being given to the expansion of military ground action on United Nations initiative, but they wondered for how long it would be feasible for the situation to remain entirely static. The prime objective of the United States, as of its Allies, is to achieve an armistice. The enemy is now under less pressure to agree to an armistice. What sort of pressure could be brought upon the enemy without widening the scope of the war or resuming active ground operations, both of which are objectionable? Hickerson said that any suggestions or advice which the Canadian or other governments might offer the United States would be very welcome.

7. This brought us to the subject of consultation. I made the point that the present precarious and ambiguous situation in Korea required close consultation. As an example, I mentioned that the screening in April of the prisoners had resulted in a much smaller figure of those desiring to be repatriated than had been expected, and that this altered the character of the package proposal; insufficient time had been left for other governments to consider this change in the prospects of Communist acceptance before the proposal was put to the Communists.

8. Hickerson and Johnson not only agreed on the necessity for close consultation but repeated that they would be more than glad to receive assistance and advice from other United Nations Governments. I suggested that it might be useful for the United States to take the initiative in requesting the views of its chief allies. This idea seemed to appeal to Hickerson. I asked whether General Clark, as the new United Nations Commander, would make an appraisal of the situation in Korea and suggested that the receipt of such a report might afford a suitable opportunity for inter-governmental consultations. Hickerson said that General Clark would proceed to Korea soon to examine the situation; he hazarded the opinion that the General's report, expected within ten days or so, would concern itself for the most part with the armistice negotiations, as there did not seem to be much to say on the military side. He expects that Clark will confirm Joy's recommendation that the United Nations Command should extricate itself from the daily propaganda sessions and bring about suspension of the meetings until the Communists were willing to enter into substantive discussions.

9. Summing up the position, Hickerson said that we have now arrived at an impasse. What was wanted was to achieve an armistice. What could be done to lead the Communists to accept the minimum United Nations terms? No solution has yet been found to these problems. The only concrete suggestion that Hickerson or Johnson could make was that the application of stringent economic and financial measures against China might help. I said that I doubted whether such measures were practicable and whether they would be effective within a reasonable period of time.

10. Recalling the proposal that Communist prisoners might be re-screened before conclusion of an armistice, I suggested that it might be wise for the United Nations side to take the initiative in having such re-screening carried out now by non-Americans, in order to strengthen before the public the United Nations position on repatriation and to counter effectively the Communist charge that the screening was "phoney". This suggestion was not enthusiastically received but was not rejected. They pointed out that the Communists were not objecting to the method of screening but were rejecting the idea of screening altogether. Nevertheless, they admitted the propaganda value of neutral re-screening. They said that the International Red Cross would be unwilling to conduct the operation unless invited by both sides. They did, however, enter into a discussion on the possibility of re-screening being carried out by representatives of such nations as India, Pakistan, Sweden and Switzerland. I have learned that later yesterday the British Embassy repeated to the State Department the re-screening proposal on instructions from the Foreign Office.

THE WAR IN KOREA:
POST-ARMISTICE DECLARATION

Mr. Bliss of the United States Embassy called on Mr. Norman on June 10 to outline the procedure currently proposed by the United States in handling the Declaration which we have agreed should be issued after an Armistice is concluded in Korea. The proposed procedure is slightly different from that we have already agreed upon but basically there is little change. The procedure outlined by Mr. Bliss is as follows: [General Clark would report immediately on the signature of the Armistice and within twenty-four hours the heads of mission in Washington of the countries issuing the Declaration would meet in the State Department to sign the Declaration. As soon as it had been signed, the text of the Declaration would be made public simultaneously in Washington and the other capitals concerned. At the same time, the United States would transmit the text of the statement to the Secretary General under a note in the following general terms:

The representative of the United States to the United Nations has the honour to transmit to the Secretary General for his information a copy of a statement issued today in Washington. Similar statements were issued today in the capitals of those nations whose forces are participating in the United Nations action in Korea.]

2. It is not certain that this would be the exact wording. Mr. Bliss said that he knew of no objection to other countries similarly transmitting the Declaration on their own behalf if they wished to do so. We have been informed separately that the United Kingdom government will probably transmit the Declaration to the Secretary General in this manner.

3. The only new factor in this proposed procedure is that action would be taken to sign the Declaration within twenty-four hours instead of within forty-eight as previously agreed. Mr. Bliss asked to be informed whether this procedure is agreeable to the Canadian Government. I can see no objection that we could now raise and if you agree, I shall inform Mr. Bliss that we do not object to the procedure he has outlined.<sup>24</sup>

4. I should be grateful to know whether you would wish the Canadian representative in New York to transmit a copy of the Declaration to the Secretary General in the same manner as the representatives of the United States and the United Kingdom. For your convenience, I attach a copy of the

Declaration of Armistice

We the United Nations members whose military forces are participating in the Korean action support the decision of the Commander-in-Chief of the United Nations Command to conclude an armistice agreement. We hereby affirm our determination fully and faithfully to carry out the terms of that armistice. We expect that the other parties to the agreement will likewise scrupulously observe its terms.

The task ahead is not an easy one. We will support the efforts of the United Nations to bring about an equitable settlement in Korea based on the principles which have long been established by the United Nations, and which call for a united, independent and democratic Korea. We will support the United Nations in its efforts to assist the people of Korea in repairing the ravages of war.

We declare again our faith in the principles and purposes of the United Nations, our consciousness of our continuing responsibilities in Korea, and our determination in good faith to seek a settlement of the Korean problem. We affirm, in the interests of world peace, that if there is a renewal of the armed attack, challenging again the principles of the United Nations, we should again be united and prompt to resist. The consequences of such a breach of the armistice would be so grave that, in all probability it would not be possible to confine hostilities within the frontiers of Korea.

KOREAN ARMISTICE NEGOTIATIONS:
EXCHANGE OF PRISONERS OF WAR

There are now four sets of proposals before us about rescreening prisoners of war. They are:

yes.

(a) The suggestion put forward in the Department on June 3 which would have the armistice agreement not cover repatriation of prisoners but bind both parties to release all prisoners when further negotiations make such release possible, bind both parties to put the supervision of the prisoners they hold under some neutral power agreeable to both, and bind both parties to continue to negotiate for the release of prisoners either separately or in the general post-armistice conference contemplated under Item 5 and already agreed to.

(b) An Australian proposal contained in telegram No. 93 of June 4 from the Department of External Affairs in Canberra to the Australian High Commissioner in Ottawa.† Copy of this telegram is attached. The Australian proposal calls for an initial offer of an impartial screening of the prisoners we hold possibly followed by an offer of impartial screening of the prisoners held by both sides.

(c) An Anglo-Indian proposal contained in telegram Z-46 of June 7 from the Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations to the Acting High Commissioner for the United Kingdom in Ottawa.† The Anglo-Indian proposal is not very different from the Departmental proposal except that it does not require the use of a neutral country to supervise the camps.

(d) A suggestion made by Walter Lippmann in a syndicated article which would require a distinction to be drawn between prisoners who do not want to be repatriated for reasons of personal advantage and prisoners who do not want to be repatriated because they require political asylum. This suggestion of course implies a rescreening and a rescreening on a very different basis from the original screening which he has criticised.

2. I would suggest that until Mr. Wrong has had an opportunity to have the discussions which he outlined in telegram WA-1590 (copy attached),† we should not try to make up our minds on the best course to follow. It might also be profitable to enquire from New Delhi what further information can be obtained about Panikkar's interview with the Chinese Vice Minister of Foreign Affairs concerning the Anglo-Indian proposal.

3. In the meantime, there are certain considerations which we might hold in mind:

(a) Public opinion in the west almost certainly requires that there should be some sort of rescreening to dispose of fears that the original screening was hopelessly prejudiced. The Australians inform us that the United States has come a considerable distance towards being willing to agree to a rescreening.<sup>26</sup>

(b) The United States has indicated that it is unwilling to consider a proposal which would involve screening the 12,000 U.N. prisoners to see which of them do not want to be repatriated.<sup>27</sup>

(c) Against this, however, it may be urged that if we insist on a screening only of the prisoners we hold, the enemy will hold some sort of screening of why not if it is done by a neutral agency.

their own which will result in some of the U.N. prisoners not being returned. It would be better from our point of view as the Australians point out if we could prevent a unilateral screening of U.N. prisoners in enemy hands.<sup>28</sup>

(d) An objective test of the willingness of prisoners to return to communist control will probably be necessary. Whether this test can be carried out by questioning as Walter Lippmann thinks, or by a physical test as the Australians imply, is a matter which will have to be decided.

(e) With the small number of Canadian prisoners who are in enemy hands, we must be careful not to urge too strongly on the Americans any course which would result in a feeling that we had urged them to make sacrifices which we did not feel.<sup>29</sup>

QUESTION OF PRISONERS OF WAR

You will recall that on June 14 I sent you a memorandum outlining briefly the various proposals which had been put forward for dealing with the question of prisoners of war. A new and more promising idea has now reached us from the Chinese themselves.

Attached are copies of telegrams Y-239† and 240† of June 18 from the Commonwealth Relations Office to the Acting United Kingdom High Commissioner. The first of these telegrams outlines two alternative schemes put forward by Foreign Minister, Chou En-lai. The suggestion for a straight exchange based on 20,000 Chinese prisoners plus an uncertain number of North Koreans would be impossible for the United Nations Command to accept. The second proposal, however, for a neutral screening appears to be the most hopeful we have had yet. I think that we should lose no time in indicating to the United States that we hope that they will agree that the United

We are also informed that United Kingdom government obtained the consent of the State Department before telling us about the State Department's reaction. It would, therefore, be in order for you, whenever you judge the time appropriate, to let the State Department know that we are happy that they have taken this action. The second Chinese proposal referred to in fact appears to concede to the United Nations side just about everything we want, while providing a way for the Chinese not to have to give in publicly. Hickerson told the British how much he appreciated the need for secrecy, so it is obvious that the State Department understands the need to do nothing which will make the Chinese lose face.

KOREA — ARMISTICE NEGOTIATIONS

1. Before today's regular meeting at the State Department, embassies of Commonwealth governments participating in the Korean war were given some information about UNC tactics for armistice negotiations by McClurkin, Acting Director of Office of Northeast Asian Affairs.

2. General Clark recommended to Washington that the Communist delegates should be informed of the revised figure of approximately 83,000 prisoners to be repatriated, with emphasis being placed upon the impartial and careful manner in which the figure was arrived at. Clark would suggest to the Communists that a date be set for the exchange of revised POW lists, with August 1st as a possible date. He would reiterate the willingness of the UNC to permit checking of the revised lists by a mutually satisfactory and impartial organization, if the Communists would accept the figure of 83,000. If the Communists would not accept the figure, he would request that they make further proposals for the solution of the problem. Clark also recommended that, if no progress were made in this way Harrison should at an appropriate time put to the Communists a proposal similar to point (b) of the Chou En-lai proposals reportedly made to Panikkar, seeking to modify the language of paragraphs 51 and 52 of the draft armistice agreement accordingly.

3. Washington replied to Clark expressing doubt about the wisdom of revealing the 83,000 figure at this time and stating that the recommendation made in the latter part of Clark's message was under consideration.

L.H. Lamb, Chargé d'Affaires of United Kingdom in People's Republic of China.

4. Clark and Harrison then both sent a message to Washington repeating that in their opinion the figure of 83,000 should be given to the Communists for the following reasons:

(I) It represents a considerable increase over the previous figure of 70,000.

(II) Communist intelligence has probably reported the new figure, in which case the UNC delegation might be embarrassed by being charged with concealing facts.

It is probable that Harrison will be authorized to give the 83,000 figure to the Communist delegation.

5. General Clark's recommendation that he should be authorized, at an appropriate time, to make to the Communists a proposal similar to point (b) of the Chou En-lai proposals has been discussed with the Joint Chiefs of Staff. General Lawton Collins,<sup>33</sup> Chief of the Army, who left Washington today for the Far East on a routine inspection journey planned some time ago, will discuss this matter with Generals Clark and Harrison and send a report back to Washington giving his opinion. It seemed apparent from McClurkin's remarks that initial reaction in the State Department is not unfavourable towards the possibility of authorizing Harrison to make a proposal of this nature even without waiting for further clarification from Peiping of the Chou En-lai-Panikkar conversations. It is probable that a decision on the matter will be made in the early part of next week. McClurkin said that the State Department would welcome any views and suggestions which Commonwealth governments might care to offer on tactics to be followed at Panmunjom.

KOREA: ARMISTICE NEGOTIATIONS

Reference: Your WA-1823 of July 11.

1. In view of the considerations outlined in paragraph 4 of your telegram under reference, we would agree that there is more chance of advantage in releasing the new figure of 83,000 as available for repatriation. On the second question concerning the Chinese proposal received through the Indians, the following is an outline of our views, the substance of which you may communicate to the State Department.

Chief of Staff, United States Army.

2. In view of the rather confusing way in which we have heard of Chou En-lai's second proposal, it might be wise to state that the following is the text as it was communicated to us by the United Kingdom:

Alternatively (a) The United Nations Command would accept in principle that all prisoners on the conclusion of an armistice should go back to their homes; and (b) those who showed a disinclination to being repatriated could be brought to Panmunjom but not under military escort and interviewed there by a committee of neutral personnel from "the four neutral states agreed upon" and the Red Cross of both sides. The Chinese and North Korean Governments would be prepared to abide by the views expressed at this interview.

We take all the foregoing to be what the State Department refers to as Chou En-lai's proposal (b).

3. After thinking this proposal over, we have come to the conclusion that it presents a fairly good chance of providing ground for a settlement. Part (a) gives the appearance of conceding to the communists what they have demanded. Part (b) gives us the substance of what we want. The way in which this might be accomplished could be by having the prisoners literally "return to their own side" by the very act of going to Panmunjom, under part (a), and by letting those who did not want to be repatriated return (or desert, depending on one's point of view) to the side which had captured them, under part (b). This idea may well have lain behind Major-General Harrison's suggested reclassification of certain prisoners, referred to in your WA-1825.†

4. We understand from the United Kingdom that Hickerson gave the United Kingdom Embassy a written comment on Chou En-lai's proposal in the following words:

The alternative proposal (b) . . . which Chou En-lai is reported to have offered as a possibility for breaking the deadlock in the armistice negotiations is interesting and would seem to offer possibilities for progress. There are however a number of points in regard to this proposal which require clarification and elaboration. It would be desirable to know what channel or machinery would in Chou En-lai's view be appropriate for such clarification and elaboration.

5. It is our understanding that the Indians were to be asked to convey this comment to the Chinese as if it came from the United Kingdom without revealing (or possibly even knowing) its American origin. What we are not sure of is whether this comment was in fact passed to the Chinese or whether transmission of it has been held up by Menon's desire to intervene personally as a peacemaker or by the absence of an Indian Ambassador from Peking. It would be unfortunate if, for either of these reasons, the Indians have not conveyed the American comment, as the Chinese may now think that the only answer to their proposal has been the bombing of the Yalu power stations and Pyongyang.

6. The opportunity afforded by the Chinese offer is sufficiently important that we should take great care to take full advantage of it. At the same time, we should proceed carefully even though this will consume more time and require great patience. Instead of the action suggested in paragraph 5 of your WA-1823, we would hope that steps could be taken to make sure that the Chinese received the comment prepared by the State Department. If there is difficulty over the absence of an Indian Ambassador from Peking, perhaps the United States could ask the United Kingdom to ask the Indians to expedite the dispatch of their new Ambassador. I suggest this because it would be too obvious an initiative either to take action through a new channel or to send a special mission to Peking. The main difficulty as we see it about having Major-General Harrison himself put forward Chou En-lai's proposal appears to us to be that the communists and especially the Chinese may so value their amour-propre that they may be put off by having somebody appear to steal their thunder. If they can be left, in their own minds at least, with the credit for proposing a solution to the deadlock, it will be well worth our while to let them have the shadow of victory in return for the substance of armistice.

KOREAN ARMISTICE NEGOTIATIONS

1. The State Department informed us about a cryptic preliminary report received at the Pentagon on the resumption of secret plenary session on July 18th. The event was disappointing. The Communists:

- (i) Rejected the new figure of 83,000 prisoners to be repatriated;
- (ii) Repeated their proposal for reclassification of prisoners according to nationalities and areas;
- (iii) Returned to an overall figure of 116,000 prisoners to be repatriated (as compared to the figure of 110,000 they gave on July 13th). The UNC delegation repeated its position on the repatriation issue and agreed to another session on July 19th.

2. It is difficult to know what to make of this somewhat retrograde position taken by the Communists. The State Department do not appear to be unduly pessimistic however. McClurkin, who gave us the information, even speculated that the Communists might be waiting for the UNC delegation to make a proposal along the line of the second proposal B of the Chou En-lai proposals made to Panikkar. (With regard to para. 6 of EX-1557, you will have seen from WA-1865 of July 17+ that Krishna Menon told Selwyn Lloyd that it was important that proposal B should not be represented as having come from the Chinese.)

3. The State Department have not come to a definite conclusion on what is to be taken from the apparent volte-face of the Chinese as indicated in the Chinese Foreign Office note of July 14 to the Indian Embassy. They would, I think, agree that any of the interpretations offered in para. 3 of EX-1565+ might be correct. Allison has suggested that perhaps Chou En-lai might have gone beyond his authority in his conversations with Panikkar and have been overruled by Mao.

No progress has been made in resolving the deadlock in the armistice negotiations resulting from Communist insistence on the repatriation of all Chinese prisoners. Secret plenary sessions are still being scheduled and we gather from conversation with State Department officials that the UNC delegation are disposed to carry on with them for a while, if the Communists continue to request them, in the hope that the latter might make some move towards breaking the deadlock.

Washington, August 12, 1952

CONFIDENTIAL

KOREA — STATE DEPARTMENT MEETING OF AUGUST 12

Addressed External Ottawa WA-2052 repeated to Permdel New York as No. 284.

Nothing new on the prisoners-of-war issue was said at the plenary delegation meeting on August 11. Harrison proposed a recess until August 19.

Nam Il<sup>34</sup> agreed, after protesting that the UNC was obstructing an armistice by refusing to negotiate at the conference table and by attempting to exert military pressure through "wanton and indiscriminate bombing", tactics which would result in "miserable defeat".

2. Hickerson said that the State Department were now looking to the probability that the General Assembly would convene in October with the armistice discussions in the same sort of stalemated position which now exists. He expressed the opinion that, if this be so "our side" should raise the Korean question in the Assembly rather than leave the initiative to the Soviet. The State Department would like to know whether the Canadian and other governments participating in the Korean action agree with this opinion.

3. Hickerson urged the necessity of "Allied" governments co-ordinating plans for dealing with the Korean question in the General Assembly. He indicated we might expect to receive before long an official level working paper containing proposals for handling the Korean question. It seems probable that the United States proposals might be along the lines of those mentioned in our message WA-1928 of July 24,† para. 4, and para. 2(d) of Spender's telegram which was reported in our message WA-1927 of July 24.†

4. You will probably wish to give consideration to the Canadian attitude on how the Korean question should be handled in the General Assembly, in the light of the hints we have had of the State Department thinking in this matter. We understand that the British Embassy have suggested to London that the Foreign Office may wish to anticipate American proposals by presenting views of their own first.

KOREA AND GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Addressed Ottawa WA-2072, repeat New York No. 288.

The State Department working paper referred to in paras. 3 and 4 of our message WA-2052 of August 12 was handed yesterday afternoon by Hickerson and Alexis Johnson to representatives of British, French, Australian, New Zealand, South African and Canadian Embassies. Following is text of the paper:

Lt. Colonel Nam Il, Korean People's Army; Chief Delegate of North Korean and Chinese Delegation to the Armistice negotiations.

Recommendations

1. The General Assembly should take action early in the seventh session along the following lines:

(a) The first step should be to seek passage of a General Assembly resolution which would:

(i) Express the full support of the General Assembly for the gallant efforts of the United Nations troops in Korea;

(ii) Express full confidence in and approval of the conduct of the Armistice negotiations by the United Nations command;

(iii) Approve the position taken by the United Nations command in regard to the question of repatriation of prisoners of war and call upon the North Korean and Chinese Communist authorities to accept an honourable armistice which recognizes the principle of non-forcible repatriation;

(iv) Request the President of the General Assembly to transmit this resolution to the North Korean and Chinese Communist authorities and to report to the General Assembly within——days on any reply received or on the absence of such a reply.

(b) Upon receipt of a negative report from the President of the General Assembly, the Additional Measures Committee should meet immediately for the purpose of recommending additional measures to the General Assembly. The Additional Measures Committee should recommend the imposition of a total embargo. (For detailed recommendations see annex.)

(c) After the Additional Measures Committee has made its recommendation to the General Assembly, the assembly should adopt a resolution which:

(i) Condemns the aggressors in Korea for their continued refusal to accept an honourable armistice in accordance with United Nations principles;

(ii) Reaffirms the determination of the United Nations to continue its action in Korea to meet the aggression and to restore international peace and security in the area;

(iii) Urges upon all states the need to increase and intensify assistance to the United Nations action in Korea and in particular to contribute additional forces to the Unified Command;

(iv) Calls upon all states and authorities to refrain from giving any further assistance to the aggressors in Korea;

(v) Recommends that all states sever, limit or refuse to enter into diplomatic relations with the aggressors in Korea;

(vi) Approves the report and recommendations of the Additional Measures Committee;

(vii) Recommends that all states take the following action recommended by the Additional Measures Committee. (For detailed recommendations see annex 1.)

(viii) Requests that member states and other cooperating states report to the Additional Measures Committee within 30 days on measures taken to implement the present resolution;

(ix) Directs the Additional Measures Committee to report to the General Assembly with recommendations as appropriate, and, at its discretion when the General Assembly is not in session, to the members, on the manner in which these states are implementing the measures recommended;

(x) Reaffirms that it continues to be the policy of the United Nations to bring about a cessation of hostilities in Korea in accordance with United Nations principles and the achievement of United Nations objectives in Korea by peaceful means.

2. Obviously an agreement should be reached on the plan outlined in recommendation 1 above in its entirety before General Assembly consideration of the first phase of that plan.

3. If at the time of the opening of the seventh session there are clear and immediate prospects of agreement upon an armistice in the immediate future and negotiations are at such a stage that discussion in the General Assembly might prejudice the outcome, the General Assembly should postpone the consideration of the Korean question until a more propitious time.

Annex 1

Recommendations for action by AMC on economic embargo. The General Assembly might recommend that every state prohibit all direct or indirect exports, re-exports, trans-shipments to, and imports from, Communist China and North Korea, and impose the following ancillary controls:

(1) Prohibit vessels and aircraft of its registry from proceeding to Communist China or North Korea.

(2) Prohibit the use of free ports within its territorial jurisdiction for the trans-shipment of any goods to or from Communist China or North Korea.

(3) Prohibit the sale or charter of vessels and aircraft to the Chinese Communist regime or to the North Korean authorities, or to their nationals, or to any person or entity acting for them.

(4) Deny bunkering and port facilities to vessels owned or controlled by Chinese Communists or North Koreans, and to vessels of any nationality believed to be proceeding to or from Communist China or North Korean ports.

(5) Prohibit the insurance or reinsurance within its territorial jurisdiction of vessels included in paragraph 4, and of all cargoes destined to or proceeding from Communist China or North Korea.

(6) Block all assets and sterilize all gold resources of the Communist Chinese and North Korean regimes and of persons subject to their control; suspend all payments to these regimes or to persons subject to their control; prohibit loans, credits, and capital flotations likely to benefit these regimes or persons subject to their control.

KOREA AND GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Addressed External Ottawa WA-2073 repeated Permdel as No. 289.

Hickerson said that it appeared that one of three situations with regard to Korea might exist when the General Assembly opened in October:

(1) The Communists might embark on a military offensive. This was not now considered likely;

(2) Armistice might be concluded. Governments participating in the Korean war have already consulted about the course to be followed in this event. The State Department, however, preparing a revised working paper dealing with this eventuality, which will shortly be transmitted to us;

(3) Continuance of a situation similar to the present stalemate. The State Department considered this to be the most likely and the working paper (referred to in WA-2072) constituted proposals for action which the State Department thought should be taken in this event.

2. Hickerson emphasized that it was a working paper and as such did not represent a final, firm position of the United States Government. It was the result of much earnest thought in the State Department, a joint production of the Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs and United Nations Affairs. Hickerson said the Secretary of State had not yet been asked to give his approval to the paper but he had a general knowledge of its contents.

3. The purpose of transmitting the paper to certain friendly governments at this stage was to provide for prior consultation with an "inner circle" before the United States should reach a final position. The only governments being informed about the paper at this time are those mentioned in WA-2072. The State Department wish to ascertain the views of these governments on the paper before transmitting it to the governments of all countries participating in the Korean action and possibly some other governments. Hickerson said that the State Department would like to receive as soon as possible the views and suggestions of the six governments concerned on the working paper.

4. Hickerson drew attention to paragraph 3 of the paper, which states that if at the time of the opening of the General Assembly session there are clear and immediate prospects of agreement on an armistice, consideration of the Korean question by the General Assembly should be postponed. He repeated, however, that if the present stalemate continued when the Assembly opened "Allied Governments" should take the initiative in bringing the Korean question before the Assembly to prevent the Soviet Union from doing so. The initiative should be taken by having the Korean question placed on the agenda at the outset and getting it discussed immediately.

5. Referring to Annex 1 of the paper (recommendations for action by AMC on economic embargo) Hickerson thought that the Additional Measures Committee should hold previous consultations to decide what measures should be recommended in the event that the Additional Measures Committee should have to meet in the circumstances envisaged in paragraph 1(b) of the paper. Hickerson pointed out that all measures recommended in Annex 1 are already being carried out by the United States. He thought that other countries participating in the Korean war should be prepared to take similar action if the Communists have not concluded an armistice by October. He thought that these actions were the least that could be done in bringing additional pressure upon the Chinese. They did not represent a widening of military action. Alexis Johnson, who takes a somewhat less pessimistic view than Hickerson of the possibility of an armistice, said he thought that, so far as the Chinese were concerned, the balance between agreeing or not agreeing to an armistice might be very fine. The additional measures proposed by the State Department would not be conclusive in themselves but, if the cost to the Chinese of not agreeing to an armistice could be increased somewhat, it might help to tip the scales in favour of an armistice. He suggested the cumulative effect might be important, in the endeavour to find the point where the Chinese might be induced to stop fighting.

6. In informal comment when handed the Working Paper the British Embassy made the observation that, in contemplating additional measures against China, it would be necessary for the United Kingdom Government to bear in mind the position of Hong Kong. We said we assumed that the Paper's recommendations on economic embargo did not envisage their implementation by naval blockade. Hickerson said this assumption was correct.

7. The Australians, referring to paragraph 1(c) iii of the Paper, commented that emphasis should be placed upon those States which had yet made no contributions to the United Nations effort in Korea. Hickerson said the language of the Paper was not final and he agreed that such an emphasis would be desirable. The Australians also suggested, with regard to paragraph 1(a) III of the Paper that specific reference to the principle of non-forcible repatriation would be unwise and some more general phraseology would probably be preferable.

8. We should be grateful to receive as soon as possible, for transmission to the State Department, your views on the Working Paper contained in our message WA-2072 of August 15.

TELEGRAM EX-1759

Ottawa, August 28, 1952

ACTION ON KOREA IN THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Reference: Your telegrams WA-2072 and 2073 of August 15.

On the basis of earlier telegrams from you reporting on United States thinking about the action to be taken in the United Nations if no armistice was achieved in Korea, we had been considering what could be done. We had come to the conclusion that there is little the General Assembly can do to bring about a settlement in Korea, but that there are three possible courses of action.

2. The first of these would be to suggest to the General Assembly that it should take no further action for the time being and that the armistice teams should be allowed to continue to try to reach agreement. This is probably the safest course in that it does nothing to provoke the enemy either into breaking off the negotiations or into launching fresh offensives. The principal disadvantage is that this course lacks public appeal and is, therefore, difficult for the United States Government and, to a lesser extent for our own Government, to present to a public which is disillusioned about the situation in Korea and longing for some clear-cut solution.

3. The second possible course would be to do something along the lines of the Soviet Union suggestion at the Sixth Session of the General Assembly to take the negotiations of the armistice out of military hands. Canada opposed the Soviet proposal on the ground that such interference might complicate rather than simplify the negotiations. This objection is probably still valid because of such political problems as representation of China and North Korea which this course of action would introduce. Moreover — though this is not a really serious practical objection — the United Nations would by this course be required to reverse the decision of the Political Committee taken January 13, 1951, approving the five points in the Supplementary Report of the Cease-Fire Group. The advantage of this course is that it at least provides the appearance of taking positive action of some sort without at the same time creating the danger of expanding the war.

4. The third possible course would be to attempt to bring about an armistice by exerting various forms of pressure on the enemy of the type outlined in your two telegrams under reference. As you yourself said, however, in commenting on this proposal when it was first broached, it would call on those members of the United Nations which have recognized the Peking Government to withdraw their recognition, and its effectiveness would depend on securing the support of all countries with trading relations with China, including India and the United Kingdom. You also noted, that, even with this support, the influence of such a policy on Chinese military capacity would be felt only over a long period, while the immediate dependence of China on the Soviet Union would be increased.

5. So far we have not had any evidence to support the thesis (your telegram WA-2073, paragraph 5), that pressure of this sort will influence the communists along the lines we want. Condemnation in the resolution of February 1, 1951, did not make the communists more amenable about the Good Offices Committee. The bombing of the Yalu and other power installations did not make the communists more agreeable on prisoners of war; indeed it may have led to the withdrawal of Chou En-lai's second proposal. Proposals for further acts approaching those appropriate to full-scale war amount to a return to the old policy — which we thought the State Department had abandoned — of “teaching the Chinese the high cost of living with the Russians”. In our view, public pressure has the effect of making the communists more stiff-necked and more determined to follow whatever course they have embarked upon. We are therefore inclined to discount heavily the suggestion that action of the sort contemplated in the State Department working paper will have any favourable effect on the armistice negotiations.

6. There is the further point that it is unlikely that any such proposals would get the support of the Asian members of the United Nations and might in fact lead to consequences more grave than any compensatory benefit which could result. Such a course of action might well result in strengthening neutralist sentiment which already exists in the Assembly and widen the gulf between the Asian and non-Asian states. We think it would be very difficult to get agreement to the course of action suggested by the United States from a broadly based majority of states. We are assuming, of course, that the agreement on United Nations action referred to in paragraph 2 of the State Department working paper refers to a larger number of states than those with forces in Korea.

7. If we were free to choose the course with the fewest practical disadvantages, we should be inclined to choose the first course outlined above. However in this matter it is necessary to weigh the State Department's estimate of the need for action by the United Nations. We think, therefore, that we should be prepared to support some sort of action in the General Assembly, but I doubt if it would be wise to go as far as the State Department working paper suggests.

8. Taking into consideration the need to appear to take action for the sake of public opinion and the need to ensure that that action will not make the real situation any worse, we are inclined to favour something along the lines of the United Kingdom resolution repeated to you in CPDUN telegram No. 512 of August 21.<sup>†35</sup> The resolution might also include the further direction along the lines of the United States suggestions that the President of the General Assembly transmit the resolution to the North Korean and Chinese Communist authorities and that he report to the General Assembly on any reply he might receive. We believe the ultimatum contained in paragraph IV of the United States recommendations should be omitted. The President of the General Assembly would be left to decide, and would be in a better position to decide, the appropriate time to report to the General Assembly failure of the Communist authorities to accept the resolution.

9. These are our preliminary reactions to the proposals put forward by Hickerson for discussion and do not necessarily represent the final attitude of the Canadian Government. We think it would be unwise at this stage to attempt to give any form of finality to the recommendations concerning Korea which should be submitted to the General Assembly.

ACTION ON KOREA IN THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Addressed Ottawa WA-2148, repeated Permdel New York No. 305.

In the absence of Hickerson on leave, the preliminary views contained in your message EX-1759 of August 28th were conveyed to Ward Allen and Louis Henkin of Hickerson's staff. These officers said that the views of the governments consulted on this matter would be collated and considered in the department, after which further discussions would be held with the embassies concerned.

2. The State Department continue to hold strongly the opinion that there is need for action on the Korean question by the United Nations. They maintain that other United Nations countries not directly participating in the Korean war would expect there to be a discussion on Korea at the seventh session of the Assembly. Furthermore they feel convinced that the Soviet Union would take the initiative in placing the Korean question on the agenda if no other

The resolution noted the Assembly's approval of the efforts of the United Nations negotiators to reach a settlement in Korea and called upon the Communist authorities to "respond favourably to the outstanding proposals of the United Nations negotiators."

government did and it was preferable for the initiative to remain with the United States and its friends.

3. One cogent question asked by the State Department officials was what should be done if, after passage through the General Assembly of a relatively anodyne resolution such as that mentioned in paragraph 8 of your message, time were to pass with no reply being given by the Communists to the President of the General Assembly and no move being made by the Communists to conclude an armistice. It is the tentative view of the Department that in such a case a second resolution should be submitted containing recommendations along the lines of the State Department working paper proposals for further punitive political and economic measures against China. The Department would be glad to have your views on the action which should be taken in these circumstances.

4. As to the efficacy of an economic embargo, the State Department argue that the test of efficacy should be made not only from its probable military results, but also bearing in mind the moral and psychological aspects. They consider it possible that the cumulative effect of further measures against the Chinese might possibly tip the scales in bringing the Chinese to a decision to free themselves from the cost of the Korean war. It will thus be seen that the State Department make a different estimate from us of the psychological impact of the further proposed measures against the Chinese.

5. Allen and Henkin agreed with your remarks about the desirability of gaining as broad support as possible for a resolution on Korea. They thought that the Arab countries would not have much reason to be deterred by proposals for economic embargo, but they admit that India and some other Asian countries could not be expected to go along. They wondered whether something less than full embargo might be worked out.

6. In the course of the discussion Allen and Henkin took issue with two points made in paragraph 5 of your message. They argued that it has not been demonstrated that the stepped-up bombings in North Korea have had an adverse effect upon the peace negotiations and cited as possible evidence to the contrary Kim Il Sung's recent statement that North Korea would be prepared to make peace on the basis of a drawn fight. With regard to the latter part of paragraph 5 of your message, the State Department officials said that the proposals in the working paper on Korea were not drawn up with an eye to any particular policy for dealing with the Chinese problem. The purpose behind them was to impress upon the Chinese, without actually enlarging the conflict, the high cost of making war in Korea. Nevertheless, they would say that, so far as the fundamentals of United States policy towards China are concerned, one of the tenets of this policy is to make the Chinese uncomfortable in the Russian embrace.

7. We can expect the State Department to discuss the matter of action on Korea in the General Assembly again with us shortly. In the meantime we should appreciate receiving from you any views you might care to express as to what action should be taken in the circumstances referred to in paragraph 3 above.

ACTION ON KOREA IN THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Reference: Your telegram No. WA-2148 of August 29.

Following from the Under-Secretary.

1. I am grateful to have had such a prompt expression of State Department views as given to you by Allen on our comments with respect to action on Korea in the General Assembly. I have not considered it necessary, however, on the basis of the views reported in your telegram under reference to advise the Minister of any need to reconsider the position which was set out in EX-1759 of August 28. I would like here to re-emphasize some of the points made in our original telegram in order that you will be in a better position to continue discussions with the State Department on this subject.

2. There is obviously a basic disagreement between ourselves and the State Department on the efficacy of further political (i.e. "moral and psychological") and economic pressure on the Chinese and North Koreans. We continue to doubt that such pressure will have any noticeable effect on the Communists. Steadily mounting military pressure has been applied to the enemy forces recently by United Nations air forces. While the North Koreans may have been affected we can find no proof that those who play the dominant role in the present struggle have responded to even this military pressure.

3. At the Sixth Session of the General Assembly spokesmen for a large number of member states, including all those with forces in Korea, argued in strongest terms against removing the armistice negotiations from the hands of the military negotiators at Panmunjon and transferring them to the General Assembly. The United States spokesman, for example, on February 5, said in part, "We do not think that discussions here and now can possibly facilitate the armistice negotiations . . . We must exercise our responsibility to ensure that nothing should be done here to delay or to prevent the conclusion of an armistice." In the course of the same speech he pointed out that the injection of political issues into the discussion, the transfer of military matters under negotiation in Korea to the General Assembly, the tendency to re-open questions already settled by the negotiators at Panmunjon, and the name-calling indulged in by the Soviet representative were four developments "all of which, in our judgment, are harmful to the course of negotiations and show the adverse impact which discussions here would have upon the negotiations." The overwhelming vote with which the proposal for deferment of consideration of the Korean item was accepted was the best indication that to practically all the representatives of the non-communist world such a deferment made sense. It is significant that India departed from the position of abstention which it had adopted on so many important items before the Assembly to vote in favour.

4. If the stalemate in negotiations at Panmunjon continues to exist when the Seventh Session of the General Assembly meets it would seem to our advantage to continue the line which was considered best last year and which received general support. We agree that it might be desirable, while maintaining the basic position that the armistice must be concluded at Panmunjon, to ask the General Assembly to endorse in general terms the conduct of the armistice by the United Nations Command to date. The Soviet Union and its satellites would, we believe, rail against such a stand just as unsuccessfully this year as last. In our opinion this course of action has the virtue of honesty. We cannot see how the General Assembly can find a solution to the outstanding issues which are holding up an armistice.

5. We believe that those important states with "neutralist" sentiment might find it possible again to support this course of action or at worst not oppose it. We firmly believe they will find it necessary to oppose further condemnatory and punitive proposals. A display of disunity with respect to Korea in the General Assembly would surely overshadow in the public mind an possible effect which might be hoped for in the attempt to bring further pressure to bear on the Chinese and North Koreans. Finally, it is, and can be interpreted in presentation as, a course of action indicating the firmness of intent of the United Nations to support those negotiating in its name for a just and honourable settlement in Korea against any unreasonable demands on the part of the Communists. It will demonstrate to the Chinese and North Koreans that they cannot achieve their aim of discussions covering political and military subjects prior to an armistice and may lead them to the realization that negotiations must be concluded at Panmunjon. Significant majority support, we believe, could be obtained for this course of action if it were carefully argued, and the effect of such a show of firm intent would, in our opinion, be more likely to give us an indication of "the point where the Chinese might be induced to stop the fighting" than the course of action proposed by the State Department.

6. It follows, therefore, in our opinion, with reference to paragraph 3 of your telegram, that failure of the Chinese and North Korean authorities to respond in any positive fashion to a resolution along the lines of the United Kingdom draft mentioned in paragraph 8 of our EX-1759 might be noted by the General Assembly with regret, and that once again the negotiators at Panmunjon be encouraged to continue to seek an armistice agreement.

7. Our position will be strengthened if all reasonable attempts have been made at Panmunjon to meet the outstanding issue of the repatriation of prisoners of war. (We might expect that failing an armistice the Russian will rehash in any Korean debate in the General Assembly all the arguments on prisoners of war which have been advanced by the Communist delegation at Panmunjon.) We are encouraged, therefore, by the careful consideration being given by the State Department to the idea of some forward step in the negotiations concerning the prisoners of war as reported in your WA-2150 of August 29† and London's 1868 of September 1.† Without being unduly optimistic we believe some hope has been restored that an armistice agreement may be reached. If it should come before the General Assembly meeting the tactics under discussion in this telegram are no longer a problem and the course of action on which a fair degree of unanimity has been achieved can be considered. If the Communists at Panmunjon wait upon developments in the General Assembly it seems of greatest importance that they should not enjoy the spectacle of divided councils among the non-communist states in the General Assembly and be encouraged thereby to hold out for further concessions before agreeing to armistice terms.

8. We believe, therefore, we should concentrate on taking in the General Assembly only that action which (a) will command the support of the great majority of member states who supported the initial action in Korea; (b) will not call upon member states to take action which some important states will be unwilling to take; and (c) the majority can agree will not make more difficult the conclusion of an armistice agreement at Panmunjon.

1. I think that you might have a word with the Minister on this if this is possible before his departure for Europe. The reason is that he was present at a meeting yesterday morning on United Nations questions at which the means of handling the Korean issue in the Assembly was discussed. Those at the meeting included Alexis Johnson, Sandifer,<sup>36</sup> and Ward Allen of the State Department. The discussion related more to matters of procedure in the Assembly than to the substance of the action which might be taken. One point which emerged was that the State Department officials were anxious that discussion of the Korean issue should begin early in the Assembly's proceedings on the first part of their two-stage "realistic" proposal. Consideration of this almost certainly could not be completed until after the presidential elections on November 4th. We shall forward a fuller report on this discussion.

Following from the Under-Secretary.

1. I spoke to the Minister prior to his departure concerning the meeting referred to in your telegram, which he had with State Department officials.

2. I understand that he was careful not to be put in the position of opposing the first stage of the American proposal, since we have already stated that we would agree to a resolution along the lines of the United Kingdom draft resolution which is similar to the resolution proposed by the United States. The Minister told me that he had pointed out to United States officials that they should not be too optimistic about the prospects of obtaining a large majority on even this first stage since many delegations would see that this resolution was merely preliminary to further action and would hesitate to vote for the resolution. Abstention of a large number of delegations would be unfortunate in view of the reasonable nature of the first resolution.

3. Although Mr. Pearson did not mention this to United States officials, our position would likely be that we would have to make it clear in supporting the resolution that this would not in any way commit us to any further step which might be proposed.

4. It is my understanding, therefore, that we should continue to express doubts about the United States two-stage proposal, without appearing to object to any reasonable resolution along the lines of the United Kingdom draft. The Minister's inclinations seem to be against the tactics of appearing to act over-hastily in the Assembly, as this might alienate some delegations whose support we would wish to have. However, I understand that he did not offer strong objection to action early in the General Assembly.

5. It would be valuable for us to have the fuller report on this discussion referred to in your telegram.

ACTION ON KOREA IN GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Reference: Your EX-1822 of September 10th.

Addressed External WA-2241, repeated Permdel No. 325.

Following for the Under-Secretary, Begins:

1. We are told that the State Department's intention is to have further individual consultations, probably next week, with the Embassies of the six countries which were given copies of the State Department's working paper of August 14th. The unfavourable comments of the five Commonwealth Governments were similar in substance. We do not know the details of the French reply except that it was also unfavourable. Hickerson returns from leave on Monday, and the State Department will not adopt a definite position until he has been consulted.

2. We gather, however, that in spite of the adverse comments they are not likely to drop their insistence on the need for more than a hortatory resolution, and particularly their desire for more stringent economic sanctions. I am inclined to urge that if this matter should be pursued, the best method would be to do so through inter-governmental negotiation and not by seeking Assembly approval. We understand that the State Department may be willing to drop the proposal that the Assembly should recommend "that all States sever, limit or refuse to enter into diplomatic relations with the aggressors in Korea," but they seem still to contemplate a two-stage procedure in the Assembly if the stalemate in the armistice negotiations continues. The reason why they want the Assembly discussion on Korea to begin as soon as possible after the Assembly opens is to allow time for the second stage, which would involve action by the Additional Measures Committee before discussion in the First Committee.

3. As previously reported, the belief that further sanctions might make the difference in securing Communist acceptance of an armistice is based on the view that a little more pressure would do the trick mainly because of alleged acute shortages of essential materials in China. It seems to me that this is a hope, rather than a conclusion that can be drawn from any available evidence; the State Department is, however, assembling data which it will give to us.

4. With regard to the meeting attended here by Mr. Pearson on September 5th, you will now have received the report enclosed with my letter 1964 of September 8th.† The Minister certainly took the line that a large majority for the hortatory resolution was unlikely unless delegations were satisfied that this was all that they would be asked to support. Incidentally, the second recommendation in the working paper of August 14th states that agreement should be reached on the two-stage plan "in its entirety" before consideration of the first phase begins in the Assembly — a condition which cannot be fulfilled unless the governments already consulted completely change their positions.

ACTION ON KOREA IN THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Reference: WA-2241 of September 13th.

Addressed External WA-2278 repeated Permdel New York No. 328.

1. Hickerson, who has just returned from leave, lunched with me today, and we had a general discussion on this subject. There will be a fuller discussion within a week, when consideration has advanced in the State Department of the comments of the six governments consulted on the working paper of August 14th.

2. Hickerson confirmed that this paper has never been more than a working paper developed by the Bureaux of United Nations and Far Eastern Affairs as a basis for consultation on the official level with a few other governments (see our WA-2073 of August 15th). It was circulated in this manner in order to assist in determining what Assembly action would be acceptable to governments with forces in Korea. He thought that the paper had never been seen by the Secretary of State, although Mr. Acheson may have some idea of its contents.

3. Hickerson said that, as a result of the adverse comments from all six governments, changes would have to be made. The Assembly should be asked to adopt a resolution embodying the first phase of the proposals in the paper; any subsequent action by the Assembly in the direction of the second phase must depend on further consultations with other governments, including consultations after the Assembly has opened. He still favours stronger economic measures in an effort to secure, on the authority of the Assembly, something more positive than an endorsement of the actions of the United Nations and Unified Command and an exhortation to the Communists to come into line. I think, however, that we can safely regard the second phase of the proposal in the paper of August 14th as being in the melting pot. The British Embassy is of the same opinion. Hickerson incidentally volunteered the opinion that if all the suggested new sanctions were put into effect, results would only be achieved over a very long term; this is not in accord with the opinions previously expressed by some officers of the State Department that new pressures might make the Communists soon decide to sign an armistice acceptable to us.

4. He has been thinking along lines rather similar to the suggestions made by the Secretary General and Gross for trying to raise substantial new United Nations forces. (See Permdel's messages 548 of September 6th† and 562 of September 10th.)† He spoke of the need to withdraw before very long perhaps three United States divisions and to replace them with new United Nations forces and additional South Korean troops. This is based on the assumption that there is no end of the fighting in Korea in sight. I told him that it seemed unrealistic to me to suggest that new contributions of ground forces to the extent of 40,000 men or more could be secured from members of the United Nations; I believe he realizes this at heart. This, however, seems to me to be a safer direction in which to attempt to proceed than to seek approval of vigorous new economic and political sanctions.

5. Hickerson emphasized once more that there was no desire or intention to take steps involving an extension of the war. While the idea of a naval blockade was brought forward from time to time by Admiral Radford<sup>37</sup> and other officers with some support in the Navy Department, this did not accord with the policy of the administration, which continued to favour the restriction of combat operations to Korea.

6. I asked him whether there was any connection between the suggestions for punitive action in the Assembly and the presidential campaign. He said that one aspect which might conceivably have some influence on the campaign concerned the great share of the burden borne by the United States, which led to complaints against the too meagre effort of other members of the United Nations. This, however, was not an issue between the political parties. There was nothing, he thought, at issue about what ought to be done, despite public impatience over the deadlock; nor, given the views of General Eisenhower and Governor Stevenson, was it at all likely that any such issue would be injected. A lot, of course, was being said on the Republican side about the mistakes in the past in the handling of Korean matters, but very little on the means whereby an escape might be found from the present stalemate. From the point of view of the Democratic Party, their prospects in the election would be improved if an armistice could be concluded within the next six weeks. I agree with his comments, and I learn that the British Embassy has recently expressed similar views to the Foreign Office.

7. I shall be sending a further report on this topic in a few days after the State Department has resumed consultations on the action which might be taken by the Assembly. You will have noted the public statement of Mr.

ARMISTICE NEGOTIATIONS IN KOREA

Reference: My immediately preceding telegram.

Addressed External WA-2279, repeated Permdel New York No. 329.

1. I briefly discussed with Hickerson the present state of the armistice negotiations, opening the discussion by remarking that I thought it would be bad tactics to continue the recent procedure of holding a brief and unproductive weekly meeting in Panmunjon, and that something new should be attempted before the General Assembly met. He at once agreed and assured me that they were seeking agreement here on a new proposal on the issue of prisoners of war. This might follow the line of the suggested immediate exchange of the "repatriables" in United Nations hands for the prisoners whose names have been notified by the Communists, leaving the future of the balance to be settled by later discussions. Full agreement had not yet been reached, however, on the advantages of such a scheme.

2. If the Communists rejected a new United Nations proposal, Hickerson thought it would be better to discontinue meetings at Panmunjon, while maintaining contact through liaison officers, and to tell the Communists that the United Nations delegates would appear only after they were informed through the liaison officers that the Communists had something new to propose.

3. I do not see much prospect of a proposal being made which has any serious chance of acceptance by the Communists. The nub of the problem is the fate of the non-repatriable Chinese prisoners. If they could disappear in some way, I doubt that we should have much trouble about the non-repatriable Koreans. I did not succeed in getting a definite opinion from Hickerson on the Mexican proposal.

ACTION ON KOREA IN THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Reference: WA-2278 of September the 18th.

Addressed External Ottawa WA-2312, repeated to Permdel New York as No. 335.

At yesterday's State Department meeting on Korea Hickerson made a statement on tentative United States views on this question. This statement represented the first step in consultations on the matter by the United States with governments other than the six governments mentioned in my previous messages. Later the United States delegation in New York will consult with the delegations of some other governments not participating in Korean action.

2. Hickerson prefaced his remarks by saying that the United States and its allies should take the initiative in raising the Korean question in the General Assembly. Governments should give careful thought to the way in which this might be done.

3. On the assumption that the deadlock in the armistice negotiations would continue, Hickerson said that the United States now envisaged two stages of action: (1) The introduction into the General Assembly of a simple and non-controversial resolution endorsing the stand of the UNC negotiators and calling upon the Communists to accept the UNC position and proceed to the conclusion of an armistice; (2) if no results ensue, consideration must be given to the question of what further action should be undertaken by the United Nations. Hickerson said that at the present time he wished to speak only about stage (1). He would have something to say about stage (2) at a later date.

4. Hickerson gave the text of a rough draft of a resolution which might be presented to the General Assembly. He described this draft, which is by no means firm, as "short, simple, relatively non-controversial and one which it was to be hoped could pass almost unanimously." The draft resolution is as follows:

The General Assembly noting with approval the efforts of the United Nations negotiators to achieve a just and honourable armistice and to bring an end to the fighting in Korea in accordance with the United Nations principles;

Noting further that disagreement on one remaining issue alone has to date prevented the achievement of such an armistice; endorses the position which the United Nations negotiators have taken on the issues on which agreement has been reached as well as on the question still in issue;

Calls upon the Chinese Communist and North Korean authorities to avert further bloodshed by responding favourably to the outstanding proposals of the United Nations negotiators;

Requests the President of the General Assembly to transmit this resolution to the North Korean and Chinese Communist authorities and to report to the General Assembly, as soon as he deems appropriate, upon any reply received or the absence of any reply.

5. There was little discussion of the proposed resolution at the State Department meeting, since it could not be revealed by certain governments that they had been engaged in prior consultations on the matter with the State Department. The proposed draft resolution, however, and Hickerson's statement clearly show the result of these prior consultations. Hickerson pointed out that the resolution was in general terms and did not point up the issue of no forced repatriation. He said that the United States wished to have the views of governments concerned, and that discussions on this matter would be centred in New York, where representatives of other governments would soon be sounded out. He suggested that the comments and views of governments on the handling of the Korean question in the General Assembly might now best be conveyed to the United States through delegations in New York, being repeated to Washington for information.

6. He repeated that governments should also be considering what further action was to be taken if the Communists made either no reply or a hostile reply to the proposed hortatory resolution. He said that in the United States view it was not desirable at this time to consider further military steps but it was necessary to discuss what other ways there might be of putting pressure on the Chinese through such means as further economic pressure. The United States would wish to have the views of governments on this question also.

7. The fact that Hickerson did not go into the question of further action to be taken, if there is no favourable reply to the proposed General Assembly resolution, should not be taken to mean that the United States is preparing to give up the idea that some measures should be taken in such an event. I understand that it is the intention of the State Department to explore separately with the five Commonwealth Governments concerned and with the French what additional measures might be taken against the Chinese, if they should not respond to the General Assembly resolution. The State Department wish to discuss this matter with the six governments before doing so with other governments.

Ottawa, October 6, 1952

KOREAN QUESTION AT THE SEVENTH SESSION OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY<sup>38</sup>

At the present time, we do not know whether there is any prospect of reaching an agreement on an armistice at Panmunjon, or whether the present deadlock will continue after the final Communist reply is given to the proposals for compromising the prisoners of war issue, which were advanced by General Harrison on behalf of the Unified Command on September 28. In the absence of such knowledge, it is impossible as yet to give the Delegation detailed instructions on the position which it should adopt on proposals regarding Korea which may be advanced at the forthcoming Assembly.<sup>39</sup> However, a number of guiding principles have emerged from the general position the Canadian Government has already adopted on issues connected with the problem of Korea; and these principles are set forth below for the use of the Delegation.

(a) It is fundamental to Canadian policy to limit the present hostilities to the Korean peninsula; and to continue the search for an early settlement of these hostilities by negotiation.

(b) It follows that our general attitude in the Assembly should be to support proposals which will facilitate the armistice negotiations, and to oppose those proposals which would impede an armistice. At the same time, the Canadian Government supports the position adopted by the United Nations negotiators in opposing demands for the forcible repatriation of prisoners of war.

(c) The objective of the United Nations intervention in Korea is to resist aggression in that peninsula, not to overthrow the present Communist regime in China.

(d) The Canadian Government is not persuaded that additional political and economic sanctions against China will weaken either that country's capacity or

Les propositions furent rejetées par les représentants communistes le 8 octobre, après quoi les négociations en vue de l'armistice furent suspendues.

The United Nations negotiators proposed that prisoners of war be brought to an agreed point in the demilitarized zone and released after their identity had been checked against agreed lists. A further offer gave the Chinese officials an opportunity to participate in the rescreening of prisoners who had refused repatriation.

The proposals were rejected by Communist representatives on October 8, after which the armistice negotiations were recessed.

its will to continue fighting in Korea. Moreover, such sanctions will, in any case, be ineffective unless they are supported by every important country concerned, including, specifically, China's Asian neighbours such as India. This applies particularly to proposals for a total economic embargo against China.

(e) Our principal potential enemy is the Soviet Union, not China. While it is necessary for us to continue our military action to resist aggression in Korea, until such time as an armistice is concluded, we must not overlook the danger that military pressure extended to Chinese territory will further cement the present Sino-Soviet alliance, and will indefinitely postpone the re-emergence of those frictions which have in the past developed between these two historic rivals.

(f) Moreover, it seems unlikely that any large number of additional United Nations troops are available as reinforcements in Korea. The only troops which appear to be available are the Chinese Nationalist troops now in Formosa. The Canadian Government is wholeheartedly opposed to the use of these forces in Korea, as such a development would not only involve us in support of the Nationalists in a continuation of the civil war in China, but would contain a very real danger of provoking a Third World War.

It follows that the Canadian Delegation should support proposals, consistent with the principles stated above, which are designed to break the present armistice negotiations deadlock; and that it should adopt an attitude of caution towards proposals calling for additional punitive measures against the Chinese.

Up to date, three proposals dealing with Korea in the General Assembly have been the subject of preliminary discussion between Canadian representatives and representatives of other friendly governments. In the event that these proposals are formally submitted to the Assembly, the Canadian Delegation should be guided by the principles mentioned above, and the additional comments given below.

The United States Proposal. Representatives of the United States have been discussing in Washington a two-stage proposal for action in the Assembly. In the event that armistice negotiations at Panmunjon continue to be stalemated when the Assembly meets, this proposal would involve: (a) in the first stage, a resolution endorsing the stand taken by the United Nations negotiators at Panmunjon and calling on the Communists to accept this stand in its entirety; and (b) in the second stage, following upon the expected negative reply of the Communists, or their failure to reply, the United States proposal would call for action by the Additional Measures Committee and by the General Assembly for further political and economic sanctions against Communist China and North Korea — including, more specifically, the imposition of a total economic embargo and the severance of diplomatic relations with China by those Members which have such relations.

It follows from the principles stated above that the Canadian Delegation should not support the introduction into the Assembly of even the first stage of this United States proposal, if the Communist reply to General Harrison's proposals of September 28 leaves any real hope that the deadlock over prisoners of war may be resolved at Panmunjon. On the other hand, if the Communists show no sign of compromising on the prisoners of war issue, the Delegation should support a resolution endorsing the proposals advanced by the United Nations negotiators and calling on the Communists to accept them. Nevertheless, the Delegation should strongly resist the introduction of any kind of ultimatum to the Communists into such a resolution. It should also be noted that the General Assembly has, thus far, not had the occasion to endorse the stand taken by the U.N. armistice negotiators, and it therefore follows that the effect of such an endorsement will depend very much on the number of states which support it. It is most improbable that such a resolution will obtain the desired overwhelming majority in the Assembly unless it scrupulously avoids language of a provocative nature.

While the Delegation may support the first stage of the United States proposal in the above manner, it should make it very clear that this does not imply any commitment to support the second stage calling for economic and political sanctions. If the Communists reply in the negative to the first resolution, as seems very probable, the Delegation must consider what further action should be taken by the Assembly in the light of the principles stated earlier in this memorandum. It is true that the desires of the United States for additional measures against China will be very understandable, and that the United States Delegation will no doubt be under great pressure from the public opinion in that country. Nevertheless, the Delegation must bear in mind the grave danger of spreading the war which would arise if action were taken merely to satisfy an impatient segment of public opinion; and it should also bear in mind that additional punitive action against China will further divide the Western democracies from the remaining non-Communist Asian states.

The Secretary-General's Proposal. Since early September, Mr. Lie has been discussing with representatives of various governments his proposal for an appeal in the General Assembly for 20,000 more volunteers for Korea. Mr. Lie thought that these forces should be recruited from as many countries as possible, and especially from those which have not yet contributed. His idea is that the force would be trained as a United Nations' Division in the United States, and at American expense. The Secretary-General has pressed energetically in the Collective Measures Committee for a United Nations Legion, and it may be that he would hope to fit into the military framework of such a legion the body of additional volunteers which, he proposes, should be requested for Korea. The Collective Measures Committee did not give detailed study to the Secretary-General's further proposal, but most members of the C.M.C. showed little enthusiasm for it. The Canadian Delegation in the C.M.C. took little part in the discussion of the subject, and did nothing to encourage the proposal. While there seems to be some merit in appealing to those governments which have thus far not sent any forces to Korea, to do so, there is little likelihood that there would be any favourable response to such an appeal. If this proved to be the case, Mr. Lie's proposal might have the effect of further diminishing the prestige of the United Nations. There is also the danger that, if Mr. Lie submits his proposal, the Chinese Nationalist representative will seize the occasion to say that his government is both able and willing to provide the necessary troops. In the absence of a response from any other Member of the United Nations, such an offer might be very embarrassing. There are thus a number of serious difficulties and even dangers, which may arise if this proposal is pursued. The Delegation should point out these dangers in discussion with other friendly delegations, but should not take the initiative in opposing consideration of the Secretary-General's appeal, as we are in sympathy with his basic objective.

In any case, the Canadian Delegation should make it clear that it has no authority to give any commitment regarding the despatch of additional Canadian forces to Korea.

The Mexican Proposal. In a Note to the Secretary-General early in September, the Mexican Government proposed that the immediate exchange of those prisoners of war in Korea who wished to be repatriated, should take place. Each United Nations Member would then pledge itself to admit to its territory an agreed number of prisoners of war who had refused repatriation, granting them the status of immigrants in order to admit them to gainful employment.

The main objective of the Mexican proposal is to provide asylum for prisoners of war resisting repatriation to Communist control. Its merit is that it would afford an opportunity for participation in the United Nations action in Korea by those countries which have not sent military forces. On the other hand, its defect is that it presupposes that the Communist authorities will compromise on the question of non-forcible repatriation and, for this reason, avoids the central issue. However, although the Mexican proposal does beg the central question at issue, it nevertheless would provide a method of ensuring that non-repatriated Chinese prisoners were not taken into the Nationalist forces on Formosa. For this reason the Mexican proposal might possibly have some appeal for the Communists. In any case, it underlines a genuine problem, namely, what is to be done with those prisoners who are not repatriated, if the Communists do agree to compromise on the forcible repatriation issue.

In discussions up to date, a number of responsible governments, particularly the United Kingdom, have stressed to the Mexicans that they believe this proposal should be pursued, initially, at least, through normal diplomatic channels, rather than by introducing it as a resolution into the Assembly. The Canadian Delegation should generally support this point of view. However, if the resolution is placed before the Assembly, the Delegation should not oppose it, but should make an effort to ensure that the commitment to give asylum to such prisoners of war would be the primary responsibility of those countries which have not been able to send military forces to Korea.

KOREA — ACTION IN GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Addressed External WA-2508 (Important) repeated to Permdel as No. 383.

At today's State Department meeting on Korea the proposed United States draft resolution concerning Korea was distributed to representatives of governments participating in the Korean war. My immediately following teletype gives text of draft resolution which is also being discussed concurrently with delegations of these governments in New York.

2. Alexis Johnson observed that the proposed resolution is similar to that which had been given to us previously by Hickerson (see (WA-2312 of September 24) but had been revised to take into consideration consultations with other governments which had taken place in Washington and New York. He hoped that governments concerned would make known to the United States as soon as possible their views on the draft resolution. He suggested that this should be done through delegations in New York, since it was possible that the Korean item might be discussed by the Political Committee as early as Thursday.

3. Johnson repeated that the State Department considered that the 'Allies' should take the initiative in the Korean discussion. He hoped that it would be possible for the resolution to be sponsored by all the United Nations Governments participating in the Korean war; the resolution had been drafted with this in view. He said that the United States realized the necessity of getting as wide a measure of support as possible for a Korean resolution. It was hoped that the proposed resolution would be supported by an overwhelming majority and it was thought not unreasonable to expect support for it at least from the 53 nations which have given either moral or material support to the United Nations undertaking in Korea.

4. Johnson noted that paragraph 7 of the draft resolution is an addition to provide for recognition of suggestions for the solution of the prisoners of war problem which have been made by Mexico and Peru.

KOREA — ACTION IN THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Reference: WA-2508 and WA-2509 of October 21, repeated to Permdel as No. 383 and 384.

Following from the Under-Secretary, Begins: My preliminary view of the United States draft resolution contained in WA-2509 is that it is fully in accordance with the instructions approved by the Cabinet on October 9, and that the Delegation may support the text as it now stands. It should be noted that this draft resolution does not contain any ultimatum to the Communists and that it is not drawn up in provocative language. The only time limit placed on reporting by the President of the Assembly is the duration of the present session, and this seems reasonable enough.

2. It may be that amendments will be submitted, particularly by friendly Asian states, to paragraph 8 of this draft resolution in order to make the language more general and to avoid such a clear delineation of the issue in dispute between the United Nations and the Communists. If such amendments are submitted, I think you should give them favourable consideration if, in your judgement, they will have the effect of increasing the majority for the resolution.

3. Paragraph 3 of WA-2508 refers to the question of co-sponsorship by "all the United Nations governments participating in the Korean war." I do not believe there would be any objection to Canadian co-sponsorship of this resolution if the other governments concerned are also prepared to co-sponsor. This is obviously a point on which you will wish to consult other friendly delegations.

4. In view of Mr. Pearson's strong interest in this subject, you will undoubtedly wish to keep him informed regarding the Delegation's position on any developments which may take place. Ends.

KOREA — ACTION IN THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Reference: Your telegram No. 19 of October 23, 1952.

After discussions last week with members of the United States and Commonwealth delegations on what type of resolution might provide the best basis for action in the First Committee, we tried our hand at drafting a resolution late last week of a very restricted nature. Its object would have been to get Assembly approval of the specific proposals offered by the Unified Command on September 28, with respect to the prisoner-of-war issue. Annexed to the resolution would have been the detailed proposals offered by General Harrison on September 28. This was prior to receipt of the United States draft resolution contained in WA-2509.

2. Our idea of a restricted resolution and our draft resolution itself was not rejected by friendly delegations nor was it received enthusiastically. At no time did we mention our draft resolution to the press and we showed the draft text only to the United States and Australian delegations.

3. Yesterday, October 23, we were asked to co-sponsor the United States resolution, the text of which was the same as that contained in WA-2509 with the exception of a few minor changes. After consultation with Mr. Pearson, we agreed to act as co-sponsors along with the majority of governments with troops in Korea. We reserved the right to return by way of amendment to our idea of a restricted resolution in the event that discussion in the First Committee indicated that the neutralist States such as India would be unprepared to vote in favour of the more general resolution.

4. We have made every effort to draw the Indian delegation out on its views with respect to practical action by the Assembly on Korea, without much success. The Indian attitude has been described rather aptly as one which is against sin but uncertain as to how virtue can be implemented.

5. Mr. Acheson will introduce the resolution under reference at the meeting of the First Committee this afternoon, October 24.

Following from Martin, Begins: At the Commonwealth meeting this morning there was an interesting, if at times confused, exchange of views on the turn the discussion would take on Korea as a result of the United States resolution.

2. Krishna Menon was drawn in the discussion and, while pointing out that he was speaking personally, gave an interesting insight of Indian thinking in the matter.

3. Menon made it quite clear that it would probably not be possible for his delegation to vote for United States resolution. He deplored the fact that the question of an invitation to South Korea had been raised yesterday leading to the counter proposal that North Korea also be invited. He also thought that the United States resolution was ill-timed since it would force delegations to take sides at a very early stage in the debates.

4. Menon said that if the main purpose of the discussion was to lead in the direction of an armistice in Korea, more realism would have to be projected in the debates. He thought that the solution might be sought in the following direction:

(1) A study of the word domicile as it appeared in Vishinsky's statement of October 18th as applied to what he thinks would be the small group of those prisoners of war who refuse repatriation might lead to a practical solution of this thorny problem. In his view, it would not be impossible to come to an arrangement whereby no prisoners would have to be repatriated by force.

(2) The machinery for the cease-fire talks should be made more acceptable to the North Koreans. He vaguely referred to the possibility of adding neutral powers to the representatives of the Unified Command. In his view, it was not possible to think that "the same people fighting all day could make much progress towards an armistice at night."

5. Naturally, the United States resolution does not lead in the direction outlined by Menon and doubt was expressed as to whether it would be possible to steer the debate in the direction of those proposals. Menon believed that this could be done. The United States, the U.S.S.R. and other delegates would blow off steam during the first part of the discussion and realize that this led them nowhere. A new approach could then be submitted by more neutral powers (he did not exclude the possibility that India might be willing to take such a responsibility) on the lines of his suggestions. In this respect, Casey of Australia told me that Mrs. Pandit<sup>40</sup> had informed him that India would not like to take the limelight but that, if an impressive block of powers asked them to undertake negotiations with the Chinese Communists on a basis which would be acceptable to India, then the Indian Government would be willing to consider such a course.

6. During the discussion, I took the line that we would, of course, co-sponsor the United States resolution but that this did not mean that we would oppose other resolutions or suggestions leading to an honourable armistice.

7. I would not wish to give too great importance to the concrete suggestions put forward by Menon at this meeting not only because he is at times apt to be carried away by his imagination but also because there are very serious obstacles to their implementation. Ends.

KOREA — ACTION IN THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Reference: Your teletype No. 63 of October 24.

Following from the Under-Secretary, Begins: I think the initiative contemplated in your teletype under reference might well be useful. However, you will be in a better position than us to judge, from your contact with other delegations, whether or not it will be advisable to put forward the proposed Canadian amendment.

2. The main thing seems to be to obtain the largest possible majority in the Assembly for endorsing the proposals advanced by the U.N. negotiators on September 28. If the more restrictive amendment contemplated by you would have the effect of genuinely increasing this majority, I am inclined to think you should submit it. However, I do not think the amendment should be put forward unless the United States and the other co-sponsors are prepared to accept it into the present resolution; and unless we receive advance commitments from India and the other "neutralist" states that the introduction of such an amendment will make it possible for them to vote in favour of the amended resolution. In other words, I do not think the amendment will serve much purpose unless it has the effect of bringing the United States and India together on the same resolution.

3. I note from paragraph 4 of your teletype under reference that you have not had much success in obtaining the views of the Indian Delegation, but this would seem to be one of the keys to the situation.

4. I would be glad to see the text of your contemplated draft amendment. Ends.

KOREA

Addressed External No. 101, Important, repeated Beaver No. 22.

There was a further Commonwealth meeting this morning, during which some interesting points emerged about a possible settlement in Korea.

2. There was first a general discussion as to whether the Chinese Communists were in good faith or not in seeking an armistice. Krishna Menon, speaking for India, said that he was sure that the Chinese Communists were anxious in their effort to seek an armistice, that he could already prove it but that he would even have better proof in about a week's time. Selwyn Lloyd was not willing to go that far but thought that the Chinese Communists would agree to an armistice if they could save face. Sir Zafrulla Khan, on the other hand, took the view that the Chinese would not willingly give up unless and until they were sure that an armistice would be followed by a general settlement in the Far East which would be satisfactory to them. In his view, the prisoner-of-war issue is only an excuse and the Chinese could continue to find other excuses as long as they considered that the United States is not ready to agree to a settlement in the Far East.

3. With such divergent interpretations, it was normal that the United States resolution which we have agreed to co-sponsor should be viewed differently. Menon now confirmed that India could not support it because they were unable to endorse all that the United Nations Command had done. Specifically, he mentioned the bombings of the Yalu River. He added that we should not delude ourselves about the majority with which this resolution would be passed and that as far as the Chinese were concerned, it made no difference to them whether it was passed by a small or large majority. As far as India was concerned, he pointed out that they could play a much more constructive role by not being tied by the terms of the resolution. Lloyd was rather cautious (although there is no doubt that the United Kingdom will not only support the resolution but also appeal for as wide a support as possible) and only made the rather jesuitic comment that he saw some advantage in the present resolution since a milder course could be followed once it had been passed. Zafrulla Khan said that the resolution was probably alright if we were satisfied with dealing with the limited field it covered but that it did not end the matter.

4. Mr. Martin took a line similar to the one already expressed in our telegram under reference whereby Canada would support the resolution but would be open to any other suggestion or course of action which would lead to an honourable armistice. He also pointed out that in view of his position, the statement he intended to make at a later date would clearly leave the door open. Casey is following a similar course and intends to make a rather mild statement.

5. Menon further elaborated his views on the lines which might be followed to find a solution to the prisoner-of-war issue. He first pointed out that his delegation could not agree with the United States interpretation of the Geneva Convention. He said that it was impossible to interpret the Convention to mean that prisoners-of-war could "opt for a new nationality" as suggested by Mr. Acheson. The following is a simplified version of the plan he suggests and which, in his estimation, might be acceptable to the Chinese. The advisory commission of neutrals already agreed upon, i.e. Czechoslovakia, Poland, Sweden and Switzerland, would undertake the role of "protecting power" for the prisoners-of-war on both sides. Prisoners-of-war would be delivered to them at demilitarized points and they would be treated according to the terms of the Convention for all purposes including that of repatriation. De jure this would mean that prisoners-of-war would be apt to be repatriated by force according to the letter of the Convention and the interpretation given to it by the Communists, but, de facto it would be agreed by all parties concerned that no prisoner would be repatriated by force according to the spirit of the Convention and the interpretation given to it by the non-Communists. Prisoners-of-war willing to be repatriated would be free to do so immediately while the others would remain in the demilitarized zone under the custody of the protecting power for as long as they wish. This ingenious formula was not discarded altogether by Selwyn Lloyd who said that his immediate reaction was that he saw no harm in having the prisoners-of-war handed to a protecting power but that further study would have to be given to it. We have not had time to consider it ourselves and it may be that this is but a "re-hash" of suggestions already agreed upon by the Unified Command but rejected by the Communists. Our immediate reaction, however, is that it would probably be very difficult for the United States administration, at this stage at any rate, to give in on the de jure recognition of the principle of non-forcible repatriation.

6. Meantime, the discussion on the United States resolution has to follow its normal course, and unless Vishinsky makes some conciliatory move in his speech tomorrow, the resolution will continue to be the only issue openly under consideration.

7. This creates a very odd situation whereby two sets of discussions are going on jointly on the same subject, one openly in the First Committee and the other among members of the Commonwealth. It seems to be generally agreed among this latter group that the debate in the First Committee is rather unreal since most if not all of the Commonwealth members are now convinced that there is no chance of obtaining an armistice through the pressure brought on the Communists by the resolution being discussed in the First Committee whereas there might be some slight chance of obtaining an armistice through the good offices of India. We must still go through the formal motion of supporting the United States resolution however, and unless instructed to the contrary, will continue to do so.

8. The fact that India is willing to take the lead in these negotiations is encouraging. If they fail, we will be no better off but India will realize how difficult it is to come to an understanding with the Communists; if they succeed, then an armistice will have been achieved. There is a further advantage in the negotiations being undertaken by India. You may remember that in his speech, Mr. Acheson made it quite clear when he introduced the resolution now under consideration that this was a "preliminary attempt", thus inferring that other steps might have to be taken. Surely, he must have had in mind the condemnatory resolution which the State Department have already shown us and which we gather they are still intent on submitting to the Assembly at a later date during this session if no progress is made on the basis of the present resolution. It may be that the negotiations of the Indian Government will make this second resolution either unnecessary or premature before the Assembly is over, and this would be a most welcome development for many delegations, including our own.

9. We realize the complexities of the Indian suggestion and are not at all in a position to say whether they will succeed or not. In the very unhopeful atmosphere that prevails here, however, about a settlement of Korea based on action taken as a result of the United States resolution, it seems that we are bound to give moral support to the Indians. At no time have they asked us to give them any other sort of support.

10. We may have further comments to make on the Indian suggestion after we have studied it more closely and we will pass them on to you. Meantime, we would be glad to receive your views. Mr. Pearson will be discussing this in more detail with you during his visit to Ottawa.

KOREA — PRISONERS OF WAR

Reference: Your telegram No. 45+ of October 28.

Addressed Ottawa No. 117, repeated Washington No. 27.

1. As we dig deeper into the problem of Korea as it tends to develop at this Assembly and specifically into the resolution of which we are one of the co-sponsors, it is becoming increasingly clear that we must address our remarks in the main to the restricted question of the disposition of prisoners of war. Our instructions indicate we must oppose the principle of forcible repatriation and we will do so. However, it causes us some concern that we may, in presenting our case publicly on the issue, find it necessary to express ourselves in a manner which would not indicate the concern which was in the minds of our representatives at Geneva — that Canadians in future wars “would not be deprived of any of the protections of the Geneva Convention on the pretext that they desired to renounce such protection.” We shall have to make our stand on the intent of the Geneva Convention rather than on the letter of the law and trust that in the circumstances you will find this method of approach acceptable.

2. This morning (October 29) two representatives of the State Department's Legal Division (Hincken and Runyon) and Ward Allen discussed the legal considerations underlying the position of the United Nations Command regarding the issue of forced repatriation of prisoners of war with Mr. Martin and officials of the delegation. They left with us a set of papers which had been produced in the State Department to fortify the case made by Mr. Acheson in his opening address. Copies of this material will be sent to you, although probably not in time to allow you to analyze them prior to our statement in which we may use to argue that international practice as distinct from what the Convention says has not been such as to support the argument that prisoners of war must be returned by force to the state to which they owed allegiance originally.

3. We asked these officials whether there had been any concern expressed in Washington with respect to the precedent which we were establishing which might boomerang against our forces in a future war. They said that this problem had caused a good deal of concern and that the implications of the United Nations Command's stand on non-forcible repatriation had been made clear to the President. However, it had been the considered view of civilian and military departments that the stand on non-forcible repatriation should be taken.

KOREA COMMONWEALTH MEETING

Reference: Our telegram No. 101 of October 28.

Addressed External No. 127, repeated Beaver No. 28.

A further Commonwealth meeting was held this morning, October 30, to discuss Vishinsky's statement and to obtain a further elaboration of Indian thinking on an approach to Peking.

2. Zafrullah Khan led off on the Soviet resolution<sup>41</sup> and suggested we should concentrate on its meaning while ignoring the context in which it had been presented. He made it clear that in his mind the resolution could not be considered unless to it were added (a) unequivocal acceptance of the principles of non-forcible repatriation and (b) the prior conclusion of an armistice agreement. We would then face the problem of agreeing on the composition of the commission and the problem of how it might be used to bring about solution of the broader problem of Korea.

3. The Australian and New Zealand spokesmen were obviously inclined to turn down the Soviet resolution out-of-hand. In their minds it would involve the relinquishing on our side of the principle of non-forcible repatriation. They tended to regard it simply as a device to remove the negotiations from Panmunjom.

4. Menon believed that the resolution was purposely vague, ignored completely the prisoner of war problem, and was addressed to the future rather than to present issues. He devoted most of his attention to an elaboration of the views he had put forward at the earlier meeting (my telegram under reference). He argued that the Geneva Convention did not provide for direct repatriation but rather for the turning over of prisoners of war by both sides to a protecting power which, under the terms of the convention, was debarred from the use of force. He believed we should make every attempt to learn from the Chinese whether they would be prepared to agree that custody of prisoners of war should in the first instance be assumed by the neutral nations supervisory commission (Switzerland, Sweden, Poland, and Czechoslovakia) on the understanding that, if a dispute arose as a result of an individual prisoner of war expressing his determination not to return to one side or the other, the representative of a fifth state might act as referee. In response to Australian criticism that his plan made no provision for the expression of opinion of an individual prisoner of war for or against repatriation prior to the time of his entering the custody of the protecting power, he pointed out that the negotiators at Panmunjon had already agreed on the movement of prisoners of war to the demilitarized zone. The same difficulty therefore was inherent in the scheme offered by the Unified Command. He believed that the prisoner of war problem had become separate and quite distinct from the problem of a general armistice agreement. In addressing ourselves to Vishinsky's statement and his resolution, therefore, we should do nothing to make more difficult some agreement with the Chinese on the prisoner of war issue. Several times he stressed his belief that Vishinsky could not speak for China.

5. Lloyd indicated the general line he would take in his statement this afternoon and stressed that his main purpose would be to pin Vishinsky down on the question of whether in fact he was advocating the forcible repatriation of those who might indicate to a neutral body that they did not want to go home. Zafrullah Khan supported this line of approach. It was agreed that Vishinsky had based his argument on the flat assertion that there was no one who would refuse repatriation and we had therefore to face him with the fact that there were such individuals and to go as far as possible to force him to take a stand on the issue. It was finally agreed even by Menon that such a line of approach would not complicate any other approach which might be made to the Chinese.

6. Mr. Martin took the line that Soviet resolution might be acceptable after an armistice which provided for the free expression of the desires of prisoners of war with respect to repatriation. He thought it was our duty at this moment to combat any impression which Vishinsky had made on public opinion as to the validity of his legal argument on the Geneva Convention. He indicated his belief that there might still be room for a more restricted resolution which would address itself purely and simply to the principle of non-forcible repatriation. He agreed that the United States could not be expected to consider the Soviet resolution in its present bald form.

Following for Weiss<sup>42</sup> from Freifeld,<sup>43</sup> Begins: Mr. Martin will make an important statement of approximately six thousand words on the Korean question at the beginning of this (Monday) afternoon's meeting of the Political Committee. which, within the spirit of the United States resolution co-sponsored by 21 Powers, avenues could be explored to break the present deadlock in the armistice negotiations in Korea, with particular regard to the outstanding question concerning prisoners of war. Attention might be drawn to this significant point (which in the text is worded as a question) that there be no forcible detention and no forcible repatriation.

2. We will be issuing an advance text only shortly before the commencement of the statement. Important excerpts from the present draft may be teletyped to the Under-Secretary during the morning and if so, they will be repeated to Washington. We will not be able to send the definitive text as delivered until tomorrow morning at the earliest, although we just might be able to send you a copy tonight by airmail special delivery.

Korea — The Canadian Statement

6. Mr. Ronning. On November 3, the Canadian Representative (Mr. Martin) spoke in the Political Committee, and gave a lengthy statement of the Canadian position on this item. The chief points made by Mr. Martin in his statement were the following:

(a) He addressed a number of questions to Mr. Vishinsky in order to draw from the latter a more definite statement as to what the Soviet Union had in mind by proposing the establishment of a Commission "for the peaceful settlement of the Korean question." More particularly, Mr. Martin asked: "Would this Commission be created before an armistice had been concluded, or is it suggested that the cease-fire talks should continue while the Commission discusses other problems related to the "peaceful settlement of the Korean question?"

(b) Mr. Martin stated that the Canadian Delegation still stood by the Statement of Principles put forward on January 11, 1951, by the Cease-fire Group of the General Assembly. (This Statement of Principles was approved by the Political Committee on January 13, 1951, by an overwhelming vote.) He reminded the Committee that, under the terms of these principles, the proposed political conference would not take place until agreement had been reached on a cease-fire.

(c) On the specific question of repatriation of prisoners, Mr. Martin stated: "The Unified Command has proposed that any of a number of impartial groups might be organized to interview prisoners of war who have indicated that they will forcibly resist the final stage of their repatriation. In the circumstances no use of force would be possible, for the prisoners would be in a demilitarized area under the control of an impartial protecting agency. So far the Communist Command has failed to indicate why such a proposal is unacceptable. Perhaps the stumbling block is the composition of these suggested impartial protecting groups. Yet the Communist Command has been able to agree to other joint commissions. For example, they were able to agree to the composition of the commission provided for in article 37 of the draft armistice agreement. Agreement on similar lines might be possible for the task of interviewing the prisoners. If a protecting power were needed within the meaning of the terms of the Geneva Convention, consideration could be given to vesting the same group, or even another group of Powers, with this role. Those who refused to leave the neutral area would still retain the right to have their repatriation completed if and when they wished, and meanwhile they would be held by the protecting Powers in a manner to be determined."

(d) In reiterating Canadian support, for the 21-Power resolution, of which Canada is a co-sponsor, Mr. Martin stated: "The draft resolution provides an opportunity for anyone to offer any new suggestion which might lead to an armistice, recognizing the rights of all prisoners of war to express their desires with respect to repatriation before an impartial body. I note that the Government of Mexico has submitted a draft resolution which, in our estimation, was inspired by the highest motives of statesmanship and humanity. It might profitably be studied further so as to supply a practical scheme to provide for the disposition of prisoners of war who are unwilling to have their repatriation completed at the time of release from captivity and after being handed over to the impartial protection agency. My delegation would be glad to consider this proposal at an appropriate time and in the light of the progress made on the Twenty-one Power draft resolution now before the Committee."<sup>44</sup>

Within an hour of Mr. Martin's statement in the Political Committee, November 3, Menon of the Indian delegation asked to see him. He said that he liked the Canadian statement and that it would be helpful to him to be able to refer to the ideas which it contained when he made his statement. He thought it might be interpreted as the first expression by a country with close relations with the United States of the possibility of some acceptable compromise being reached which would allow for settlement of the prisoner of war issue. Mr. Martin assured him that there was no ground for any belief that our speech represented a "feeler" put out by the United States and that, in fact, the United States delegation might not have been too happy with some of the suggestions made in the Canadian statement.

2. Menon thought that Mr. Martin might approach the United States delegation now and outline in more precise terms the suggestions which had been made by the Indian in the Commonwealth meetings. Menon thought that Mr. Pearson should not be involved in order that his freedom of action might not be impaired for some future role he could play. Mr. Martin suggested the possibility of the Indians and ourselves getting together with some United States officials, possibly with Mr. Pearson present, to discuss the whole question. Mr. Martin talked later with Mr. Pearson who indicated that he was seeing Menon today, November 4, and would explore with him the suggestions that Menon had made to Mr. Martin.

3. Ross<sup>45</sup> of the American delegation saw Mr. Martin yesterday and advanced the idea that Canada might be able to contact spokesmen of the Arab-Asian group to find out more precisely what their intentions were. You will have noted the attention which the press has given to a possible Arab-Asian resolution and specifically the story contained in Sunday's New York Times (November 2). Ross thought that if there was any merit in the idea, it should be a Canadian approach not involving the President. He, too, believed that the President's position should be safe-guarded for any possible role he may yet have to play.

COMMONWEALTH MEETING ON KOREA

Reference: Our telegram No. 158 of November 4, 1952.

Addressed External No. 160, repeated Washington No. 42.

The Commonwealth group met again this morning, November 4, on the problem of Korea. The meeting was devoted in the main to an attempt to get Menon to formulate more precisely the Indian views which have been put before the committee. In this attempt, the meeting was not successful.

2. Menon was obviously unwilling and possibly unable to agree to reducing his views, to writing, especially in the form of a draft resolution. Lloyd agreed that it might be unwise for the moment to get to the drafting of a resolution since it was difficult to avoid becoming wedded to words and formulae, some of which would be impractical unless we knew in advance that they would be acceptable to both sides. Lloyd did believe, however, that it would be most helpful if the Indian ideas could be spelled out in a statement to the committee before the end of this week in order that they would be on the record and could be taken into consideration in any "great marriage" of resolutions or ideas which the committee might undertake at a later date.

3. Mr. Martin suggested a possible alternative, that Menon might put his ideas on paper for circulation to the restricted Commonwealth group. It was agreed, at the suggestion of Casey, that the six Heads of Commonwealth delegations would meet, without advisers, on Thursday, November 6.

4. Lloyd made it clear to the meeting and to Menon that there was not much point in proceeding further unless it was understood by all that any possible compromise scheme would have to contain the following elements:

(a) Agreement by both sides that the prisoner of war exchange would be governed by the Geneva Convention;

(b) That no force would be used in repatriating unwilling prisoners;

(c) That while in theory it would be possible for our side to accept the idea of a protecting power or powers taking over custody of the prisoners in a demilitarized zone, it must be understood that in the completion of repatriation, we would have to be satisfied that the protecting power would provide against the forcible repatriation of prisoners who were unwilling to return. The theme of "neutral bayonets" was not considered at the meeting.

5. A few supplementary points were made in the discussion. Menon was firmly of the opinion that the Chinese would not accept any scheme such as that of the Mexicans which would allow for the removal of its citizens to a foreign country. There was some discussion also on whether the Unified Command could be bound by decisions of the General Assembly but it was agreed that if a scheme acceptable to all parties was put forward, it would be conveyed as orders to the Unified Command. Lloyd would obviously like the Indian statement to be made before Mr. Eden addresses plenary which, at the moment, is likely to be Tuesday, November 11. All representatives were concerned at the number of different and even conflicting resolutions which might come before the committee.

INDIAN PROPOSALS RE KOREA

Addressed External No. 179, repeated Washington No. 47.

At the Commonwealth meeting this morning Menon gave an account of the scheme which the Indians are now ready to suggest to the Political Committee on the subject of an armistice in Korea. Menon was unwilling to circulate the document from which he was reading but submitted to the questions of other members of the meeting for an hour and a half. The scheme which we will outline in paragraphs 2 to 10, inclusive, will form the operative part of a resolution which the Indians are likely to table on Monday, November 10. They will not be ready to speak however before the following day.

2. Repatriation under this scheme is to be effected according to the Geneva Convention. The release will be effected at agreed exchange points where prisoners will be handed over by the detaining powers to a "Repatriation Commission". Classification with regard to nationality and area will be undertaken by the commission, the whole process being removed from military control. For the detaining power the fact of releasing prisoners of war to the Repatriation Commission would constitute repatriation.

3. In the event that difficulty might arise if large bodies of prisoners had to be transferred from their present camps to demilitarized zones and that force might even be necessary to effect such transfer, consideration might be given to the idea of demilitarizing the camps in which such prisoners are now held. The Repatriation Commission would then take over and be responsible for the prisoners in those demilitarized areas. After the process of classification has been completed prisoners of war will be free to return to their homeland according to the terms of Article 118 of the Geneva Convention.

4. Each of the parties to the conflict will be permitted access to the prisoners of war who have been held by the other party and will be given freedom to explain the situation and inform the prisoners of their rights. Red Cross teams will also have access to prisoners of war. Pending their return and during their temporary detention the prisoners of war will remain in the custody of the Repatriation Commission.

5. Prisoners of war will be entitled to make representation to the Repatriation Commission on matters pertaining to themselves and to inform it of their desires on any matter, as provided for in Article 78 of the Geneva Convention.

6. Prisoners of war shall at all times be treated humanely according to the terms of Article 13 of the convention. Force shall not be used or be permitted to be used against them by any party for any purpose and the commission will be responsible in this regard. This would not, however, prevent the commission from exercising the normal disciplinary rights of a protecting power under the terms of the convention.

7. In the case of disagreement in the commission, on the execution of the programme of release and repatriation of prisoners of war, the majority will decide. If there is a deadlock between the four members of the commission an umpire will be called in. (There is some reference to such a procedure in Article 11 of the convention but it would appear that the umpire in the present scheme would have more power than provided for in that article.) In order to avoid the possibility of a deadlock the four powers will be directed to appoint an umpire at their first meeting.

8. The terms of the repatriation arrangements will be made known to all prisoners of war.

9. The President of the Assembly will be requested by the General Assembly to transmit to the Unified Command, the Chinese People's Republic and the Korean authorities the text of the resolution with the comment that these terms are just and reasonable and that the parties to the conflict should reach an agreement on that basis as soon as possible.

10. The resolution will repeat the words of paragraph 60 of the draft armistice agreement with respect to a political conference. The administrative link whereby this political conference would be convened will be provided for by a committee of three appointed by the General Assembly and consisting of the President of the Assembly and his two immediate predecessors. Their role would be merely to make the necessary arrangements for the setting up and convening of a political conference.

11. Within the context of the present scheme the Repatriation Commission would consist of those four countries, i.e., Sweden, Switzerland, Poland and Czechoslovakia, referred to in Article 37 of the draft armistice agreement. No suggestion was made as to which country would fill the role of umpire.

12. Menon was unwilling to commit himself as to whether the Chinese would accept the scheme outlined but added that "depending on the way it was presented to them it may possibly be accepted."

13. Most of the meeting was devoted to clarification of the scheme and there was general agreement that it was worth considering. No delegate around the table, however, committed his government to it.

14. Menon, who has been in touch with the United States delegation, gave the meeting the impression that generally they were not opposed to his scheme. On the other hand Ross and Allen of the United States delegation have been more reticent in voicing their approval in their comments to us. There are to be further contacts, however, between the United States and Indian delegations and it is likely that it will be possible for them to come to an understanding. We understand that the Indian scheme is to be submitted to Mr. Acheson tonight, November 6, for his consideration.

15. So many resolutions have already been submitted on this issue that the problem of procedure will loom large when it comes to a vote. If the Indian scheme is acceptable to most delegations it may be possible to find some way to put it to a vote first and to send it immediately to the Unified Command and the Chinese and North Korean authorities. At this stage the fate of the other resolutions is unknown.

16. Since the Indians will not be speaking on their resolution before November 11, this gives us some little time to consider the implications of their scheme and we should be most grateful for any comments you would care to send us.

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

KOREA — INDIAN PROPOSAL

Reference: Your teletypes Nos. 101, 117, 127, 158, 160 and 179, and our teletype No. 75+ of November 4.

Following for the Under-Secretary, Begins: The various Divisions concerned have now examined Krishna Menon's proposal, as given in your teletypes under reference, and the following comments are offered on the basis of this examination.

2. Our understanding is that the principal points of Menon's proposal might be summarized as follows:

- (a) repatriation in accordance with the Geneva Convention;
- (b) release to a Repatriation Commission at agreed exchange points which, for the detaining power, would constitute repatriation;
- (c) classification of the prisoners with regard to nationality and area by this Repatriation Commission;
- (d) demilitarization of present camps as a possible substitute for transfer to demilitarized zones;
- (e) prisoners to be free to return to their homeland once the process of classification had been completed;
- (f) access to prisoners by parties to the conflict and by Red Cross teams;
- (g) pending return, and during temporary retention, prisoners would remain in custody of Repatriation Commission;
- (h) force not to be used "by any party for any purpose";
- (i) in case of disagreement among the four members of the Commission, an Umpire would be called in to decide the point in question.

3. Your teletype No. 117 of October 29 expressed concern to ensure that the stand which we might take, in presenting our case publicly, would not be inconsistent with the concern that was in the minds of our representative at Geneva — namely, that Canadians in future wars would not be deprived of any of the protections of the Geneva Convention on the pretext that they desired to renounce such protection. We have borne this in mind in preparing the following comments.

4. It is no doubt possible to argue that compliance with the letter of the Geneva Convention might involve forcible repatriation, and to give the Convention this interpretation might have some future advantages for us in recovering Canadian prisoners. It might also be theoretically possible to argue that the Korean problem should best be dealt with without reference to the Geneva Convention, so that in future cases we would not be bound by any precedent of retention of prisoners. In fact, however, the proposals under discussion are related to the Geneva Convention, and it is not possible to avoid the issue. We are committed to opposing forcible repatriation and must, therefore, I consider, accept the consequences which ensue from an interpretation of the Geneva Convention which does not involve forcible repatriation.

5. Notwithstanding the disadvantages referred to above, there are undoubted advantages in being able to state that proposals for the repatriation of Korean prisoners should be in accordance with the Geneva Convention. It would no doubt be bad propaganda to accept that they are not, or to consider them as special exceptions. It is to our advantage to re-affirm that, in accordance with the Geneva Convention, prisoners shall be repatriated and shall not waive this right.

6. The problem posed above would be, we believe, substantially resolved by a scheme which envisaged that the detaining powers should not be permitted to detain prisoners on the pretext that they had waived their right to repatriation, and that they should be obliged to release all prisoners and ensure that facilities were provided for the prisoners to reach their homes — the obligation of the detaining power under the Convention being discharged by the release of the prisoners to neutral powers which would assume the obligation of ensuring that these facilities were provided and that the prisoners were released.

7. We consider that a scheme containing the elements set out in the preceding paragraph would not only be within the spirit of the Convention, but it can be argued that it would be within the letter of it. The detaining power should not be charged with a breach of the Convention unless that power itself retained prisoners on the pretext that they had waived their rights. Further, the Convention provides that, under Article 6, the parties may conclude other special agreements for all matters concerning which they may deem it suitable to make special provision, so long as no special agreement shall adversely affect the situation of prisoners as defined by the Convention, nor restrict the rights which it confers upon them. The moving of prisoners of war to a demilitarized zone under the supervision of an impartial agency, and with full facilities for their repatriation, in no way restricts the rights of a prisoner of war, as provided by the Convention.

8. The considerations set out above lead us to the conclusion that a formula acceptable to us should contain the following elements:

- (a) full compliance with the Geneva Conventions;
- (b) non-forcible repatriation of prisoners;
- (c) provide a safeguard that prisoners do not waive the exercise of the right to repatriation;
- (d) ensure the release from custody of all prisoners.

9. An examination of Mr. Menon's proposal, with these factors in mind, leads us to the conclusion that our first three points are met, but that the situation as to the fourth is somewhat obscure. When the Menon proposal was first put forward (your teletype No. 101, of October 28) it was suggested that he considered that his formula implied that de jure all prisoners would be apt to be repatriated by force, even though de facto there would have been an agreement to the contrary. We could not accept this interpretation being given to the Convention. His proposal, as elaborated in your teletype No. 179, envisages that prisoners will be classified as to nationality and area, after which they will be free to return to their homeland. It does not appear that they are, in fact, to be immediately released, nor is there any provision for them to choose to go elsewhere than home, although force cannot be used to make the prisoners go home. Apparently they will be retained until some solution is found. Notwithstanding the provision against the use of force, there is, of course, some danger in leaving the final solution to the Umpire to be appointed by the members of the Commission named. In addition, there are obvious practical difficulties in dealing with large bodies of prisoners who will be under some pressure from within the camps, if the assumption is correct that they will be screened as to nationality and to area of residence only, and not as to their wishes.

10. The objections set out in the preceding paragraph do not necessarily show that the Menon proposal is unacceptable. It might be tied in with some other proposal for the eventual disposition of those prisoners who did not wish to go home. Moreover, there is, of course, some advantage in deferring the decision as to the eventual disposition of the prisoners provided that an absolute discretion is not given to an Umpire whom we may not completely trust. If the prisoners are not to be forcibly retained by the Repatriation Commission it seems that the Menon proposal must be tied in with some provision for their being granted asylum elsewhere, for example some such formula as the Mexican proposal.

11. The formula suggested in the United Kingdom Circular Y. No. 413 of November 6† (forwarded to you by bag on Saturday, November 8), seems preferable from our point of view, particularly as it contains a specific statement that prisoners of war will be neither forcibly repatriated nor forcibly detained. This would maintain the principle that the prisoners are, in fact, to be released and that even the Repatriation Commission cannot forcibly detain them. In this connection, we are rather attracted by the suggestion that inspection teams of neutral nations, assisted by the national Red Cross Societies of both sides, might supervise the implementation of this principle. Possibly this might be a more practical alternative than the Repatriation Commission suggested by Menon.

12. We appreciate that some of these comments may be out of date by the time they reach you, particularly in view of the rapid march of events in New York. However, they are transmitted for whatever background value they may have. Ends.

UNITED STATES VIEWS ON INDIAN PROPOSALS REGARDING KOREA
Addressed External No. 266 repeated Beaver No.78.

A meeting was held November 13 on United States initiative of representatives of 21-Powers co-sponsoring the resolution on Korea. Gross of the United States was in the chair. He presented United States views on the Indian scheme which echoed those put forward by Mr. Acheson in a meeting earlier in the day with Mr. Pearson and Mr. Eden on which we shall be reporting separately.

2. Gross began his resume of the Indian scheme with a statement that the United States delegation had not seen the scheme set out on paper, an assertion which might have been diplomatically necessary but was too blunt and which led Gross into difficulty later in his presentation. He did not do full justice to the Indian scheme as we knew it although he did not actually deliberately misrepresent its main elements.

3. In the United States view any resolution to be acceptable would have to contain clear affirmation of the principle of non-forcible repatriation. He "had the impression" that the Indian scheme would attempt to hide this principle. Gross was not satisfied from his conversations with Menon as to the acceptability of the structure and method of operation of the proposed repatriation commission. He regarded Menon's reference to the neutral nations supervisory commission as a "false analogy" since that body had been agreed to only as "an intelligence body" and not one which would have executive functions. The United States believed that it might be possible at the Assembly to agree in principle to a repatriation commission leaving the details to be worked out between the negotiators at Panmunjom.

4. One of his main objections to the Indian scheme seemed to centre around its lack of exact provision for those prisoners who would refuse to be repatriated. The scheme, he said, offered only the two choices of repatriation on the one hand or indefinite detention on the other. He failed to note that the United Nations Command proposals have the same blank spot. He also objected to the provision for the appointment of an umpire by the repatriation commission, or in the event of its failure to agree, by the General Assembly. In brief, his argument was the following: The truce talks were deadlocked; our side took its stand on the moral issue of non-forcible repatriation; a further deadlock could occur with respect to the appointment of an umpire; our position would then be less defensible in the consequent shift from moral to political grounds.

5. It was apparent that few of the representatives at the meeting were prepared to say much without having the text of the Indian proposals before them. Jebb of the United Kingdom was of the opinion that we should give any Indian scheme serious consideration provided only it protected the essential principle of non-forcible repatriation and he noted the value of obtaining as many votes as possible for any resolution with respect to Korea. Hoppenot<sup>46</sup> of France suggested that this was "the last chance to find a solution to the Korean problem" for the Assembly and thought that in view of the initiative taken by the Indian delegation we should look at their proposals in the spirit of compromise. Spender of Australia spoke at greatest length, the main tenor of his argument being that the resolution should lay down broad principles only which might be implemented by the negotiators in Panmunjom in which would be included the idea of a repatriation commission. He agreed with Gross that the 21-Power resolution might be amended but he argued firmly that it should not be thrown out in too great a haste. Engen<sup>47</sup> of Norway said that he understood Sweden and Switzerland would not serve on any commission which did not have clearly defined duties or on one which was required to act before full agreement on the disposition of prisoners of war had been reached.

6. It would have been very difficult for us to speak at the meeting without taking serious issue with Gross on his interpretation of the Indian scheme. This might have been necessary had he attempted to torpedo the scheme altogether. Since he did not, we decided to save our arguments until the next meeting of the 21-Powers when the Indian resolution will be available.

7. We hope to be able to send you shortly the text of the Indian resolution. It has been going through almost daily change and to have sent it to you in one of its many drafts might only have led to confusion.

INDIAN DRAFT RESOLUTION ON KOREA

Reference: Our teletype No. 266 of November 14.

Addressed External No.267, repeated Beaver No. 79.

Following is the text of the latest draft, November 15, of a possible resolution on Korea to be submitted by the Indian delegation. Our comments will follow. We are not certain that this draft resolution will be introduced. Text begins:

The General Assembly

Having received the special report of the United Nations Command of the 18 October 1952 on the status of military action and armistice negotiations in Korea;

Noting with approval the considerable progress made by negotiation and tentative agreements to end the fighting in Korea and to reach a settlement of the Korean question;

Noting further that disagreement between the parties on one remaining issue alone prevents the conclusion of an armistice and that a considerable measure of agreement already exists on the principles on which this remaining issue can be resolved;

Mindful of the continuing and vast loss of life, devastation and suffering resulting from and accompanying the continuance of the fighting; deeply conscious of the need to bring hostilities to a speedy end and for a peaceful settlement of the Korean question;

Anxious to expedite and facilitate the convening of the political conference as provided in Article 60 of the Armistice Agreement;

Affirms that the release and repatriation of prisoners of war shall be effected in accordance with the "Geneva Convention Relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War", of 12 August 1949, the well-established principles and practice of international law and the relevant provisions of the draft armistice agreement;

Affirms that force shall not be used against prisoners of war to prevent or effect their return to their homelands, and that they shall at all times be treated humanely in accordance with the specific provisions of the Geneva Convention and with the general spirit of that convention;

Accordingly requests the President of the General Assembly to transmit, along with this resolution, the following proposals to the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China and to the North Korean authorities as forming a just and reasonable basis for an agreement and to invite their acceptance of these proposals and to make a report to the General Assembly during its present session and as soon as appropriate:

Proposals

1. In order to facilitate the return to their homelands of all prisoners of war there shall be established a repatriation commission consisting of the representatives of Czechoslovakia, Poland, Sweden and Switzerland, or, alternatively, of four states, two to be nominated by each side, but excluding any permanent member of the Security Council.

2. Prisoners of war shall be released to the Repatriation Commission from military control and from the custody of the detaining side in agreed numbers and at agreed exchange points in agreed demilitarized zones.

3. Classification of prisoners of war according to nationality and domicile as proposed in the letter of October 16 from General Kim Il Sung, Supreme Commander of the Korean Peoples Army, and General Peng Teh Huai, Commander of the Chinese People's Volunteers, to General Mark W. Clark, shall then be carried out immediately.

4. After classification, prisoners of war shall be free to return to their homelands forthwith, and their speedy return shall be facilitated by all parties concerned.

5. Each party to the conflict in accordance with arrangements prescribed for the purpose by the Repatriation Commission shall have freedom and facilities to explain to the prisoners of war depending upon them their rights and to inform the prisoners of war on any matter relating to their return to their homelands and particularly their full freedom to return.

6. Red Cross teams of both sides shall assist the Repatriation Commission in its work and shall have access, in accordance with the terms of the draft armistice agreement, to prisoners of war while they are under the temporary jurisdiction of the Repatriation Commission.

7. Prisoners of war shall have freedom and facilities to make representations and communications to the Repatriation Commission and to bodies and agencies working under the Repatriation Commission, and to inform any or all such bodies of their desires on any matter, concerning themselves, in accordance with arrangements made for the purpose by the Commission.

8. Notwithstanding the provision of Paragraph 10 below, force shall not be used against prisoners of war to prevent or effect their return to their homelands and no violence to their persons or affront to their dignity or self-respect shall be permitted in any manner or for any purpose whatsoever. This duty is enjoined on and entrusted to the Repatriation Commission and each of its members.

9. Prisoners of war shall at all times be treated humanely in accordance with the specific provisions of the Geneva Convention and with the general spirit of that convention.

10. Nothing in this repatriation agreement shall be construed as derogating from the authority of the Repatriation Commission (or its authorized representatives) to exercise its legitimate functions and responsibilities for the control of the prisoners under its temporary jurisdiction.

11. The terms of this repatriation agreement and the arrangements arising therefrom shall be made known to all prisoners of war.

12. The Repatriation Commission is entitled to call upon parties to the conflict, its own governments, or the member states of the United Nations for such legitimate assistance as it may require in the carrying out of its duties and tasks: and in accordance with the decisions of the commission in this respect.

13. When the two sides have made an agreement for repatriation based on these proposals, the interpretation of that agreement shall rest with the Repatriation Commission. In the event of disagreement in the Commission, majority decision shall prevail. When no majority decision is possible, an umpire agreed upon in accordance with the succeeding paragraph and with Article 132 of the Geneva Convention of 1949 shall have the deciding vote.

14. The Repatriation Commission shall at its first meeting and prior to an armistice proceed to agree upon and appoint an umpire. If agreement on the appointment of an umpire cannot be reached by the Commission within a period of three weeks after the date of its first meetings, this matter shall be referred to the General Assembly,

15. The Repatriation Commission shall also arrange for officials to function as umpires with inspecting teams or other bodies to which functions are delegated or assigned by the Commission or under the provisions of the draft

Armistice Agreement, so that the completion of the return of the prisoners to their homelands shall be expedited.

16. When the repatriation agreement is acceded to by the parties concerned and when an umpire has been appointed under Paragraph 10 above, the draft armistice agreement, unless otherwise altered by agreement between the parties, shall be deemed to have been accepted by them. The provisions of the draft armistice agreement shall apply except in so far as they are modified by the Repatriation Agreement. Arrangements for repatriation under this agreement will begin when the Armistice Agreement has been concluded.

17. At the end of 90 days from the conclusion of this armistice the disposition of any prisoners of war whose return to their homelands has not been effected in accordance with the procedure set out above shall be referred by the Repatriation Commission to the Political Conference to be called under Article 60 of the draft armistice agreement. Text ends.

KOREAN NEGOTIATIONS

Following from the Minister, Begins:

1. I attended a meeting at the Waldorf Astoria on November 13 in Mr. Eden's suite to discuss the various resolutions now before the Assembly concerning Korea, and particularly the draft Indian resolution on which, as President of the Assembly, I have been working closely with Krishna Menon, but which has not yet formally been put forward. The following were present: Messrs. Eden, Selwyn Lloyd, Jebb (U.K.), Acheson, Gross (U.S.), Spender (Australia), Webb (New Zealand), Schuman, Hoppenot (France).

2. Eden circulated on an informal basis copies of the draft Indian resolution (which I had gone over in detail with Menon the day before), indicating that he had not been authorized by the Indians to do so and that the draft resolution was not yet in final form. The text as circulated was virtually identical with the text I had worked on with Menon the day before.

Acheson and Gross arrived a few minutes late having just come from a long talk with Menon about the draft Indian resolution.

3. Acheson said that, in his talk with Menon, he had raised several objections to the draft resolution:

(1) That it did not make it sufficiently clear that force would not be used in the repatriation of the prisoners of war;

(2) That it did not really solve the problem of the "hard core" of prisoners of war who would resist being sent back to Communist territory; and

(3) That the concept of an "umpire" as set forth in the Indian draft resolution was full of difficulties.

The central difficulty arose on the first two points. The draft Indian resolution in effect was heavily weighted to force the repatriation of the prisoners of war and left little or no escape for the non-Communist prisoners of war who, in effect, faced a choice between (a) being returned to Communist territory, or (b) remaining in custody under the control of the repatriation commission until they agreed to be repatriated, or until their future was settled at some remote political conference. The whole burden of the Indian draft resolution, therefore, was on the side of forcing the prisoner to stay in custody until he should agree to repatriation. In effect, the draft Indian resolution really gave the prisoner no choice. It was necessary to ensure that after the prisoner had been informed of the choices before him there should be some possibility open for him other than the choice between continued detention in the demilitarized zone or (what would amount to) forced repatriation. At some point the prisoner had to be turned loose. Who would turn the prisoner loose? Acheson had argued that this was clearly the responsibility of the detaining power. But under the Menon resolution, the responsibility was placed upon the five-man commission. In case of a deadlock (which would be inevitable since the Communist powers on the commission would vote to repatriate the prisoner), it would fall to "the umpire" mentioned in the resolution.

4. The composition of the commission proposed in the draft Indian resolution was a real difficulty. The United States favoured leaving its composition blank; and would like an impartial "umpire". The composition should be left to the negotiators at Panmunjom, and should not be spelled out in a resolution. Menon had favoured naming four parties on the grounds that to the Communists there was no such thing as an "impartial" state; that the four states were already named in the draft armistice agreement for other purposes; and that this procedure would forestall the possibility of a Soviet request for membership. The United States' side saw great danger in getting agreement on the "umpire", and making this issue the breaking point; they would prefer to stick to the present moral issue of non-forcible repatriation. Acheson felt that Menon's reference to the neutral nations supervisory commission was inaccurate. That commission had only "reporting" and intelligence functions, it was not an executive agency.

5. Another difficulty related to the final provision of the draft Indian resolution which calls on the President of the Assembly and two past-presidents to convene the proposed political conference referred to in Article 60 of the draft armistice agreement. As Acheson saw it the problem of a political conference had two main aspects. The first was practical: i.e. by diplomatic intercourse to decide upon the composition of the conference (which should include representatives of the Communist states, of United Nations states with forces in Korea, and of neutral states). The second problem was legal. It must be recognized that the future of Korea could not be finally decided by a small group of states, but was a matter of concern to the United Nations as a whole.

6. Mr. Acheson firmly repeated his view that we should stand firm on the 21-Power resolution and amend it where necessary consistent with its main principles. Over the past five months, he said, there had only been two real alternative propositions put by the Communists: to return the prisoners to Communist territory, or to agree to an armistice now, leaving the prisoners of war question for later determination. The draft Indian resolution in its present form would represent a capitulation to the Communists and would be so interpreted by them. This position was supported by Mr. Spender although he said he was expressing only his personal view. Mr. Spender said that any final decision on the Australian position would have to be taken by his Government. He thought it was necessary to stand fast on the principle of non-forcible repatriation and not to retreat.

7. In reply to Acheson I said it was all important to get an armistice; that it was important to get the Indians to get off the fence to the extent to which they had done in going so far with the draft resolution; that we had to make efforts even if our efforts were rejected by the Chinese; that we had not abandoned the principle of non-forcible repatriation. In reply to the argument that the draft Indian resolution did not resolve the problem of the "hard core", and that these prisoners "had no future", I pointed out that they "had no future" at present and that the draft Indian resolution, if it were accepted by the Chinese, might have the effect of appreciably reducing the size of the problem. Although I agreed with Mr. Acheson that the Indian resolution was confused and blurred, and that we should not dismiss the possibility that we might be led up the garden path by the Chinese, the draft resolution (or something like it) should be pursued. Would it not be possible to provide more clearly in the draft that "force shall not be used against prisoners of war in respect of repatriation?"

8. To the criticism that the machinery of the neutral commission would result in deadlock, I pointed out that the commission's position was similar to that of the body provided for in the draft armistice agreement. There were possibilities of deadlock throughout this whole agreement. In the last resort, its implementation depended upon good faith. This was a risk one took in trying to work out an armistice with the Communists.

9. In this general view I was supported by Selwyn Lloyd, and to some extent by Webb.

10. Schuman said little during the discussion, but was clearly sympathetic to an approach on the lines of the Indian proposals. He thought it might be possible to amend the 21-Power resolution, and that we should look carefully at the Indian proposals with a view to seeing whether at a later stage the two proposals might not be married. Lloyd (who did more talking than Eden) thought the draft Indian resolution might be amended to make it clearer that force would not be used in repatriation or detention, to take account of Acheson's criticism that the Indian proposals failed to provide an alternative to the choice between continued detention and repatriation, and to meet the United States difficulties concerning the idea of an "umpire" on the four-man commission. If the proposals could be modified on these lines, they might receive wide support, certainly wider than now likely to be gained for the present 21-Power resolution.

11. Later in the day, I met with Menon and Selwyn Lloyd and considerable progress was made in persuading Menon to accept a number of changes in his draft on the lines of the discussion. Ends.

KOREAN NEGOTIATIONS

Following the discussion in Acheson's suite yesterday on NATO matters, and when the others had left, Mr. Acheson took up with Mr. Eden and Mr. Pearson the "serious difficulties" which the proposed Indian resolution on Korea posed for the United States side.

2. Acheson said that the text itself was in such a constant state of change that he had not been able so far to inform Washington of its precise contents. On the basis of the latest draft he had seen he pointed out three principal objections:

(1) While the text of the draft resolution had been improved as a result of Mr. Pearson's talks with Selwyn Lloyd and Menon to make it clear that "force shall not be used against prisoners of war to prevent or effect their return to their homelands", the language in the actual proposals concerning the details of the repatriation arrangements was less clear, and no provision had been made in the language used to request the President to transmit both the resolution and the proposals to the Chinese and North Koreans.

(2) The Indian proposals did not resolve the problem of the hard core of prisoners who would remain under detention in the demilitarized zone. In effect, the Indian proposals would bring about an armistice only on the basis of leaving the prisoner of war problem unsolved, a proposition which the Communists had previously urged. Such a resolution would create grave problems on the military side for the Unified Command since it would leave the Communists with a pretext for resuming hostilities at a time more propitious to their own cause. Once the provisions of the draft armistice agreement had come into effect, the safeguards now available to the Unified Command would cease, and the Communists could continue to make difficulties about the prisoners remaining under the control of the Commission.

(3) The acceptance of the part of the plan relating to the umpire's functions would in effect take matters out of the hands of the Unified Command and the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and would in all likelihood be unsatisfactory to the military.

(4) In general terms, Acheson referred to the importance of the "greater sanction" in Korea, drawing a parallel with Berlin where the deterrent to Communist aggression was not our small forces in Berlin, but the threat of counter-measures on a great scale.

3. Mr. Pearson agreed at once with Acheson's first point. This was a matter which could be remedied by making the language of the detailed proposals consistent with that of the resolution, and by providing for a request to the President to transmit both [to?] the Chinese and North Koreans. On the larger difficulty which Acheson foresaw, however, Mr. Pearson was unable to agree with his view of the effect of the present provision of the proposals according to which "at the end of 90 days from the conclusion of this armistice the disposition of any prisoners of war whose return to their homelands has not been effected in accordance with the procedures set forth above shall be referred by the Repatriation Commission to the political conference to be called under Article 60 of the draft armistice agreement". If the Communists at any time wanted to resume hostilities, it would not be hard for them to trump up excuses, and they would not have to rely on the failure of the Commission to arrange for the repatriation of all the prisoners of war under their jurisdiction. The Repatriation Agreement provided for in the Indian proposals would become an integral part of the armistice arrangements. Any part of this agreement could be violated by the Communists should they choose to do so. The problem of prisoners of war was of large dimensions at the present time and was unresolved; it might be reduced to manageable proportions by an arrangement on the lines the Indians suggested.

4. Acheson held firmly to his point, however, that the Indian proposals would create great difficulties for the military and would be unlikely to command acceptance by the Joint Chiefs of Staff whose opinion would weigh heavily with the President. He would, however, send the resolution forward as soon as a final text was available. He warned, however, that we might find ourselves with a draft which would be voted against by both the United States and the U.S.S.R., unless some way could be found to overcome these difficulties.

5. Mr. Eden referred to the speeches made in the First Committee by the representatives of Pakistan and Israel, but did not argue at any length about Acheson's point concerning the military implications.

6. We understand that the present intention is that Menon will table his draft on Monday, but that he will not speak until Wednesday next in the Political Committee. We shall send you a text as soon as it is available.

KOREAN NEGOTIATIONS

Following from the Minister, Begins: Acheson asked me to attend a further meeting on the draft Indian resolution on afternoon of November 16. Also present were Lovett, General Bradley, Gross, and Selwyn Lloyd. The United States side was anxious to keep the presence of Washington visitors in New York as secret as possible. It was clear that Acheson had referred an early text of the Indian draft to Washington which had been carefully scrutinized in the Pentagon. As a result of this scrutiny, Acheson had in front of him a revised "United States" text of the Indian resolution which he said incorporated the change required by the United States side after Defence Department study, and which had received the "tentative approval" of the President.

2. Acheson said there had been three principal points of concern: it was necessary (1) to make it clear that there should be no forcible return of the prisoners; (2) to clarify the composition and functions of the commission; (3) to ensure that the General Assembly was not writing the "final word" on the prisoner of war arrangements, but that this was a matter for the negotiators at Panmunjom. As it stood, paragraph 17 of the draft Indian resolution was unacceptable. The United States could not accept an arrangement which left a hard core of prisoners under the continued control of the commission for an indefinite period. In some way, there had to be a provision either for their return, or for them to be turned loose at some stage. To leave their final disposition undefined and in the hands of the commission, or to refer it to the political conference foreseen in the draft armistice agreement were not solutions, particularly since the date of a political conference could not now be foreseen. Some alternative which would turn the prisoners loose after a foreseeable period must be envisaged.

3. Lovett took up the argument at this point. It was the considered view of the Defence Department, and this reflected the view of General Clark, that the "Menon draft" as received in Washington was militarily "completely unacceptable". It would increase the hazards to our own forces, since it failed to make clear the conditions under which a breach of the armistice might occur, and did not provide the necessary guarantees to protect our own forces. It contained a number of what he described as "erroneous assumptions". One of these was that the prisoner of war question was the only unresolved item in the negotiations. This was not the United States view, since the prisoner of war issue had to be put into context of the long drawn out negotiations at Panmunjom. It had to be realized, for example, that the arrangement agreed to by the Unified command with respect to airfields was contingent on a satisfactory solution of the prisoner of war issue. Therefore, the solution of the prisoner of war question had to be effective and acceptable before the rest of the armistice agreement could be agreed. If it were not effective, our military position would be weaker.

4. A further "erroneous assumption" was that what he termed a "capitulation" on the prisoner of war issue would secure an immediate armistice. The United States authorities recognized their military responsibilities to all the United Nations forces. It was erroneous to assume that there was more hope of getting agreement through the elimination of military pressure than there was through its application. Every advance in the negotiations had come about as a result of military pressure. The "modified" draft attempted to meet the stated purpose of the Indian views, in the light of military requirements.

5. General Bradley then took up the cudgels. The draft resolution he had seen had not clearly specified that there was to be no forcible repatriation (he had seen an earlier text). It was indefinite on the question of the final disposition of the prisoners, and this problem could drag on indefinitely. It did not make clear at what point the "greater sanction" would be invoked. An armistice on this unsatisfactory basis which left the prisoner of war question unresolved would jeopardize the security of our own forces since it would permit the enemy to build up supplies, airfields, etc., and would permit them to send down subversive agents to United Nations prisoner of war camps who could do great harm. In short, our own pressure would come off if and when we get an armistice. What we really wanted was an armistice that would be final and definitive, and which would not lead to renewed hostilities. The draft Indian resolution on the other hand really provided for forcible repatriation. It was necessary to provide in the resolution for the assumption of some measure of continued responsibility by the General Assmsembly.

6. On the non-forcible repatriation point, Lovett remarked that there had been a Senate resolution (Jenner<sup>48</sup> had been one of its leading sponsors) which clearly illustrated the bipartisan character of the support for this principle.

7. In reply, Selwyn Lloyd pointed out that, in the United Kingdom view, the practical prospect had been that there would have been an Indian resolution in any case. The effort had been made to improve it, and to try to get something more acceptable on the use of force and on other points. The prospect now was with that principle now so clearly set forth in the resolution and the proposals, the Chinese would reject it. But at least it would have the effect of rallying a wide segment of Asian opinion to our side, and would have considerable propaganda value. Paragraph 12 of the proposals made it clear that we were not trying to reach final agreement in New York, and that final action was a matter for the negotiators. There was no argument on this score. Paragraph 16, (providing for a reference by the repatriation commission to the political conference), he admitted, would have to be looked at again. But he thought Menon had in mind something along the lines of the Mexican and Peruvian resolutions, as an alternative sort of solution which the commission or the political conference might consider at a later stage. Bradley commented at this point that a political conference might take years, and that the General Assembly should take up its responsibilities.

8. I said I thought it might meet this point to have the repatriation commission make its recommendations to the political conference or to the General Assembly; and that other changes might be made in the draft resolution in committee. But in no sense, I argued, could the proposals in their latest form, or indeed at any stage, be regarded as a "capitulation". It was to be assumed that, given a solution of the prisoner of war problem, the keeping of the armistice arrangements ultimately depended on the good faith and intentions of the Communists. Nor could I agree that a solution of the prisoner of war issue on the lines proposed would affect the ability of the Communists to resume the fighting should they wish to do so. Further, an armistice, including a prisoner of war agreement carefully worked out on these lines, would have the advantage that it would make it possible to get our own prisoners back sooner.

9. Lovett again re-emphasized the important consideration of the safety of our own forces. The Unified Command could not afford now to have a "cease fire" without a clearcut indication as to what would constitute a breach of the peace, and under what conditions the "greater sanction", i.e., stage two, would be applied. Bradley added that the purpose of an armistice was to conclude a definitive agreement which would permit us to bring our troops home. This could not be done unless the prisoner of war question were finally settled, not just postponed. A false armistice would prevent our hitting the Communists' line of supply and would create serious problems for the military.

10. Because of another commitment, I had to leave before the end of the meeting, but Selwyn Lloyd was subjected to arguments along these lines for some time afterwards. It was clear that Acheson had been given a difficult time by the United States Chiefs of Staff and that he was anxious for Lloyd and myself to hear these arguments for ourselves. I assume you will wish to consult our Department of National Defence on the points raised by Lovett and Bradley in the light of the draft Indian resolution and I should welcome your comments after consultation with National Defence.

11. Later the same evening, a further meeting was held with Lloyd, Jebb and Gross, at which I was represented and at which Gross made it clear that an Indian initiative would not on the whole be welcome by the United States. The principal reasons which he advanced for this were that United States official and public opinion was "fed up" with India, as a result of its neutralist position over recent years, that many members of the twenty-one-power group would not support an Indian initiative, and that any approach on these lines would be calculated to lower still further the position of the United Nations in the eyes of American public opinion. It was clear from Gross' comments that the United States wished, as he put it, to retain the initiative and that there was little or no value in the fact of Indian sponsorship and activity on the prisoner of war question. Gross hoped that, at the twenty one power meeting scheduled for today, on which a separate report will be going forward to you, it would be possible to rally for the twenty-one power resolution, if necessary amended to incorporate those points in the Menon draft acceptable to the United States Government.

12. We were shown at this meeting the text of the principal amendments to the draft Indian resolution which would be required by the United States side after consultation with the Pentagon. Needless to say, the views of Gross concerning the value of an Indian initiative were not shared either by Selwyn Lloyd or by ourselves. Ends.

New York, November 17, 1952

SECRET. IMPORTANT

TWENTY-ONE POWER COMMITTEE ON KOREA

Reference: Our telegram No. 266 of November 14.

Addressed Ottawa No. 299 (Important) repeated Washington [No.] 89.

Following from Martin, Begins: Representatives of the 21-sponsoring powers met again November 17 to consider the draft Indian resolution on Korea. The text of the Indian resolution, with which we were familiar, was circulated by the United States with Menon's approval, although it was not formally tabled until later in the day. The text was substantially that contained in our telegram No. 267 of November 15. A copy of the resolution as finally tabled (A/C.1/734) will be sent to you by air mail.

2. Acheson acted as chairman and presented a forceful but somewhat less than objective case against the Indian proposals. He outlined what he described as "the essential elements" of any acceptable resolution on Korea: (a) Full recognition of the principle of non-forcible repatriation; (b) The necessity that any contemplated repatriation commission be a workable body; (c) Provision for "release" as well as repatriation of prisoners of war. He made this latter point his main basis for attack on the Indian proposals. His general argument was that it would be "wrong, illegal, and shameful" for the United Nations to agree to any scheme which gave prisoners of war no other choices than repatriation or indefinite detention. Such a course of action would, in his opinion, force prisoners of war eventually to accept repatriation and should be as unacceptable as the use of physical force to effect repatriation. He believed Menon over-rated the difficulties which would arise with the Communist command over the disposition of prisoners who would resist repatriation.

North Koreans among this group could be absorbed into South Korea, as they were, after all, Koreans; he thought Chinese prisoners of war could be settled in South Korea, in any country which would accept the Mexican scheme or even in Formosa; he himself saw no reason why they should not go to Formosa.

3. As opinions were given around the table, it was somewhat surprising to find the majority of speakers suggesting the possibility of acceptance of the Indian resolution, possibly with some amendments. Lloyd, of the United Kingdom, pointed out that our objective was an armistice in Korea. This we could not achieve unilaterally. Therefore, our second objective surely must be to obtain the maximum support possible for any resolution sent to the Chinese and North Koreans. He thought the Indian resolution went a good way towards meeting the essential principles outlined by Acheson, and he underlined the value of the Indian initiative per se. He thought the meeting should direct its main attention to the tactics to be employed now that the Indian proposals had been made public. The twenty-one powers could not reject the Indian resolution out of hand. They could accept parts of the Indian scheme for incorporation in a revised 21-power resolution. However, he would prefer to listen to what the Indians had to say in speaking to their resolution, and then to persuade them by force of argument in the committee to alter their resolution to meet some of our desires. Lloyd as well as other speakers thought paragraph 17 of the Indian draft might have to be amended to meet the United States point concerning indefinite detention.

4. The Australian representative favoured revision of the 21-power resolution by the incorporation into it of a number of the Indian suggestions which were acceptable.

5. I thought it was necessary to state the case for the Indian resolution at some length in view of Acheson's opening remarks. I pointed out that our objective was an armistice and that while possibly no assembly resolution would achieve that objective something along the lines of the Indian resolution might contribute more to that end than the twenty-one power resolution. I stated frankly that we had encouraged Menon in his endeavours. I expressed my belief that the vagueness of the Indian proposal with respect to the disposition of those prisoners refusing repatriation was deliberate. This resolution did not arise out of an ideal situation; we had to remember that it was set against the background of war. In the circumstances it was necessary to seek some compromise in order to achieve an armistice and we believed that the scheme put forward by the Indians for solution of the prisoner of war issue was a gamble worth taking. I implied that deliberate vagueness on the issue of final disposition of prisoners of war might make more acceptable to the Chinese a set of proposals which stated the principle of non-forcible repatriation so clearly.

6. So long as the prisoners were in responsible hands and so long as no physical force was used, we saw no great objection to the exercise of legitimate persuasion on the prisoners to the end of their acceptance of repatriation. For our own part we felt we could probably accept the Indian scheme as it stood, although, of course, Menon might be willing to agree to certain amendments. I said finally I thought it important to vote on the Indian resolution first. If it was rejected by the enemy we could return then to the 21 power resolution and would be in a much better position to urge it upon the assembly.

7. The representatives of the Netherlands, France, Norway, New Zealand and Turkey all suggested the desirability of taking action on the basis of an Indian proposal rather than the twenty-one power resolution, since it might be more appealing to the Chinese and, with some amendments, could be made acceptable to the United Nations. The only member to voice opposition to the general consensus was the representative of Greece and his interventions were not particularly effective. The Latin American and Asian representatives did not offer any opinions to the meeting.

8. It was agreed after some discussion that a subcommittee should be formed to consider immediately what amendments to the Indian draft resolution the twenty-one powers should seek. The subcommittee will be made up of representatives of the United States, United Kingdom, France, Australia, Turkey, Denmark, Colombia, and Canada. It was agreed that no approach would be made to Menon by the subcommittee until after his statement to the First Committee on Wednesday Nov. 19.

9. Acheson in summarizing the discussion made it clear that he regarded my statement as the one expressing the view in most direct opposition to United States view. He said he would speak as frankly as I had. Vagueness with respect to the disposition of prisoners of war he said was not acceptable to the United States Government. He termed Repatriation Commission a "fraud and an administrative monstrosity" since in fact the chairman or umpire would have the only effective vote. The United Nations Command wanted only a "real armistice" in Korea and not one based on vague formulae capable of differing interpretations which would leave the way open for renunciation of the agreement by the Communists after some months of military build-up in the absence of continued military pressure from our side. In my estimation, his picture of the difficulties which would be caused by the "boiling up" of incidents involving prisoners held in indefinite detention behind United Nations lines was somewhat overdrawn. He did not, however, at any point indicate that the United States would vote against the Indian resolution, even though in his estimation it attempted to "fudge up" the principle of non-forcible repatriation. We can, I believe, expect him to return to the charge when the subcommittee meets, although I think his stand may be tempered somewhat as a result of the clearly expressed feelings of the meeting this morning of the desirability of giving adequate recognition to the Indian initiative.

10. I discussed this meeting with Mr. Pearson who agreed that Acheson's arguments were similar to those to which he had been exposed over the weekend and that the position I had taken was the position he had taken throughout. It might be useful to read this telegram together with our telegram No. 291 of November 17.

KOREAN NEGOTIATIONS

Following from the Minister, Begins: You will have seen from my telegram No. 291 of yesterday's date and from the report of Acheson's concluding remarks at the 21-Power meeting yesterday morning, that the United States Government appear to attach great importance to the possible adverse effect on the military position of United Nations in Korea of any arrangements on the lines of Article 17 of the Indian draft resolution which, as they say, would in effect leave the prisoner of war question unresolved after an armistice. The considerations behind the United States thinking in this respect were outlined at length in my telegram under reference, but I confess that I am unable to understand their significance. It would seem to me that all the military arguments against Article 17 would apply to any armistice agreement. It is true that the Communists would have an extra reason for abandoning the armistice if they desired to do so, by appealing to Article 17 and the undisposed prisoners, but they could find equally good excuses in almost every paragraph of the existing draft agreement which has been accepted by the Unified Command. Their argument in this respect creates a doubt, and General Bradley's attitude last Sunday underlines this doubt, whether they do not think that any armistice at this time would prejudice the military security of the troops.

3. I should be grateful, therefore, if you would discuss this particular aspect of our problem with our Department of National Defence and if I could have a considered statement of their views and your own on this problem at the earliest possible date. Ends.

Ottawa, November 19, 1952

With reference to your letter of today's date and the attached telegrams regarding the Korean armistice negotiations at the United Nations. As you will realize it is not possible in the time at hand to secure the views of the Chiefs of Staff but I have discussed this matter with General Simonds,<sup>49</sup> who has the major interest in this matter, and I submit the following observations on the US military objections to the Indian proposals, particularly Article 17.

In the first place the US authorities may be concerned regarding the question of the number of prisoners they now have in comparison to the numbers they have stated on other occasions they have captured. You will recall that in September a message was received from CRO London which indicated Air Vice Marshall Boucher, the UK representative at UN Command, advising that the number of Chinese PWs that the UN Command claims to be holding are in excess of those actually held. In the first place the number of Chinese surrendering and those said to be refusing repatriation may have been exaggerated in an effort to establish a psychological victory over the Chinese. It may also be possible that since these prisoners on Kojé and Kojé-Do were not very well guarded following the Chinese offensive many may have escaped to the mainland of China. Therefore, the US military may be worried regarding any discrepancy being used by the Chinese for propaganda purposes on the basis that they may be accused of doing away with some of these prisoners. This of course would provide the Communists with very strong reasons for breaking any truce negotiations on the grounds that either the US has slaughtered some Chinese prisoners or had not turned the complete number over to the neutral authority.

The other US military objections to the proposed armistice arrangement are not understood. We have always assumed that the negotiations at Panmunjom had cleared up all outstanding points except the question of the exchange of prisoners and that if satisfactory arrangements could be made for the exchange of prisoners there was no further impediment in the way of an armistice, and we do not understand the connection between this and the question of construction of airfields to which Mr. Lovett referred to in his conversation.

In regard to General Bradley's views, there are no doubt serious military objections to long drawn out armistice proceedings and the dangers of a long period of cease-fire are much more acute to the UN forces than to the Communist forces. You will appreciate that previous armistice arrangements have usually been made between the victor and the vanquished and the victor was in a position to dictate the settlement of political questions. During a prolonged period between the commencement of an armistice and the political settlement it would be possible for the Communists to use this period of cease-fire to carry out the further build up of their forces, repair and improve their communications and stockpile war material in the forward areas. On the other hand, the UN forces would not take a similar advantage of a cease-fire, nor could they continue to build up their forces even if they observed the Communist forces were being considerably increased as it is very unlikely that any of the UN countries will be prepared to commit any more soldiers to Korea.

I would suggest that in order to overcome the US military objections efforts be made to shorten the period between the commencement of the armistice and the political settlement, and a system of neutral observers be instituted to report any abuse of armistice conditions. If steps, such as these, could be taken it is considered that the main military objections could be eliminated.

It has been previously mentioned that the morale and fighting efficiency of the troops may tend to depreciate during periods of an armistice. This is no doubt true in certain respects, however, we consider that if certain of the divisions could be withdrawn from the line during this period and taken to rear areas for a period of re-training this disadvantage would soon disappear, and further this period of inactivity could perhaps be put to good use in training more South Koreans to replace UN divisions in the line in order that the repatriation of UN forces could be speeded up as and when a political settlement could be achieved.

Therefore, in the main we consider that the military objections to this armistice suggestion could be reduced by:

(a) a system of inspection to prevent either side taking advantage of the armistice, and

(b) an effort should be made to reduce the period between the commencement of the armistice and the final political settlement.

Yours sincerely,

CHARLES FOULKES
Lieutenant-General
Chairman, Chiefs of Staff

TELEGRAM 312

New York, November 19, 1952

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

MEETING, RE RESOLUTIONS ON KOREA,
OF SUBCOMMITTEE OF 21-POWER GROUP

Reference: Our telegram No. 299 of November 17, 1952.

Addressed Ottawa No. 312, immediate, repeated Washington No. 92.

The sub-committee appointed by the 21-power group met for almost four hours November 18. Since it is impossible to give a detailed account of the multitude of views expressed, this telegram attempts to summarize the main direction of the sub-committee's discussion. The group is to continue its discussions this morning.

2. Spender of Australia was unanimously selected to be chairman and did a good job in difficult circumstances. Shann<sup>50</sup> of Australia was selected as rapporteur and will submit his report of yesterday's meeting before today's meeting.

United States views on tactics

3. Gross for the United States strongly opposed the idea of acceptance of the Indian draft resolution in place of the 21-power resolution as a basis for the assembly's action on Korea. The United States delegation, after a careful survey of the likely reaction to the Indian resolution in the First Committee, believed that solid support of the Arab-Asian group for the Indian resolution would not be forthcoming. We were therefore involved merely in an effort to obtain six or seven additional votes for the resolution. Gross was of the strong opinion that our acceptance of the Indian draft would be a clear rejection of the 21-power draft resolution since, if the Indian resolution were adopted, sent to the Communists and rejected, we could certainly not return to anything like the present 21-power draft. He believed that our acceptance of the Indian draft resolution would be regarded by the Communists as a concession on the part of the United Nations and would be exploited to induce further concessions. This had been the experience of the negotiators at Panmunjom whenever attempts were made to meet the position of the Communist command.

K.C.O. Shann, Department of External Affairs of Australia.

United States views on substance

4. Gross repeated the United States views as to the three essentials which would have to be included in any acceptable resolution (our telegram under reference):

- (a) A clear statement of the principle of non-forcible repatriation;
- (b) A workable commission; and
- (c) An "all important provision" which would set out clearly the requirement for final and definitive release from captivity of the "hard core" of prisoners who would resist repatriation.

5. The United States delegate thought that too high a price might be paid for Indian initiative if the Indian scheme were to result in the loss of initiative by the 21-power group, further confusion in the armistice negotiations, a retreat or surrender to Communist pressure or finally a set of proposals which would not materially affect the possibility of an armistice agreement.

6. Gross insisted that Menon did not want United States support for his resolution since he regarded himself in the role of the great neutral moderator. In his remarks, Gross came very close to an attack on Menon personally rather than on the Indian proposal. He asserted that Menon "was precipitating a first class crisis with the knowledge and possibly the purpose of putting the United States and the Unified Command in a difficult position in his effort to reach a compromise with the Communists." Gross stated that he could not feel certain that Menon would not back away from his own resolution if it were amended in a manner which would make it suitable to us. (Gross made every attempt to interpret "us" as the 21-powers standing firmly on this issue when in fact it was quite apparent that there was division of opinion.)

7. In spite of the firm stand which Gross took in support of the 21-power draft and against the Indian draft, he did submit in the course of the meeting:

- (a) The text of the United States suggestions for revision of the 21-power draft, including provision for a repatriation commission (text is contained in my immediately following telegram), and
- (b) The text of the United States suggestions for revision of the Indian draft (the text will be forwarded by airmail).

8. Since the sub-committee proceeded to examine in detail the United States suggestions for revision of the Indian draft, Gross took the opportunity to advance against that draft those arguments with which we were familiar (our telegrams Nos. 291 of November 17, 283 of November 15, among others). Probably his main arguments were to the effect that the United States would require different and better provisions with respect to the umpire to be appointed and some provision for an "exit" for non-repatriatable prisoners of war.

9. Gross believed that if the 21-power draft resolution was revised along the lines of the United States suggestions it would take care of the proposals put before the First Committee by Mexico and Peru which two countries might even join in sponsorship of the revised resolution. Gross began and ended his main interventions in the sub-committee's discussions with the firm statement that he was under explicit instructions to press for passage of the 21-power resolution as amended.

Sense of the meeting on tactics

10. The United Kingdom, France and Canada strongly favoured the tactic of voting first on the Indian resolution with possible amendments to meet the United States view, keeping the 21-power resolution and other resolutions before the First Committee "in reserve". Canada and the United Kingdom spoke most strongly, although their views were taken up by France, Australia and Turkey, concerning the importance of the Indian initiative per se. There is little doubt in our mind that Australia moved closer to the position on tactics taken by Canada and the United Kingdom. In the words of one of their representatives, they were "revolted by the pressure tactics ineptly applied by the United States spokesman." It is important, however, to note that Australia has not committed itself so fully to support of the Indian proposal even if amended as has Canada and the United Kingdom. So far as the other countries represented were concerned, Turkey seemed to be on the fence, but probably capable of being influenced by the United States to its point of view, Columbia was fully committed to the United States view and Denmark remained silent.

Sense of the meeting on substance

11. It is proper I think to conclude that the temper of the meeting forced the United States representative unwillingly to reveal United States suggestions concerning the revision of the Indian draft and therefore its stand on the substance of that draft. A large portion of the meeting was devoted to a detailed consideration of these revisions. No such detailed attention was given to the suggested United States revisions of the 21-power draft. These are to be considered at today's meeting.

12. Lloyd of the United Kingdom submitted a text which might be substituted for paragraph 17 of the Indian resolution and which reads as follows:

"Within a fixed period from the signing of the armistice agreement, the disposition of any prisoners of war whose return to their homelands has not been effected in accordance with the procedure set out above, shall be decided by the Repatriation Commission. The Repatriation Commission shall make arrangements for the care of such prisoners of war with a body set up for the purpose by United Nations (a resettlement commission). This body will consist of representatives of .....and shall assist in making arrangements for the release and settlement of these prisoners of war within a fixed period thereafter."

Lloyd said he could not stress too vigorously his belief that an amendment along these lines should be submitted by a neutral power, in the course of the discussion which is bound to follow Menon's statement today. He believed that other amendments to the Indian draft such as those suggested by the United States (paragraph 8(b) above) might be suggested to Menon outside the committee. The sense of the meeting, or at least the impression given by those who spoke, seemed to be the hopeful one that most of the suggested United States revisions of the Indian draft could be accepted by Menon.

13. The arguments put forward by Gross on some points of detail did not stand up before the questioning of the United Kingdom, French and Canadian representatives. We cannot, in this telegram, set out all the details in this respect but examples of what is meant are the following: the vagueness of the Indian draft, the problem of indefinite detention, the definition of freedom for a prisoner of war and the problems which would be presented to the United Nations Command by the reason of the hard core of prisoners of war in areas behind the lines.

Conclusion

14. We believe the United States made a tactical error in producing the texts of their two revisions thereby indicating to the sub-committee that they were, in fact, prepared to admit in the circumstances of the need for a repatriation commission, and that they had given some thought to making the Indian proposal acceptable to them in spite of their arguments to the contrary. We believe it is safe to say that the sympathy of some members of the group was alienated by the manner of Gross's presentation and by his obvious attempt to belittle the Indian resolution and to force the subcommittee to express its support for the 21-power resolution as a basis for assembly action in Korea.

15. It is clear, however, that at the moment, the United States will oppose the Indian draft resolution even as amended. Gross said at one point "we will vote against the Indian proposal in its present form or in anything like its present form". The victory, therefore, in yesterday's meeting for the view that the Indian proposal should be given priority may be somewhat hollow if the United States maintains its firm position. Certainly some members of the 21-power group as a whole will be affected by this firm stand. It is clear, however, that at the end of yesterday's meeting, Australia was much closer to the position which we have taken than it was formerly and France was certainly more forthright in its support of the Indian initiative than it had been.

16. The position as regards the eventual establishment of priorities and the manner in which the Indian resolution is to be amended is still very unclear at this stage. It may be that the United States representatives will be able to convince the 21-power meeting that priority should still be given to their resolution. This could not be attained, however, unless better arguments are used than those submitted yesterday by Gross. We should also consider the possibility that, having agreed to give priority to the Indian resolution, the United States could submit amendments of such a nature that the Indians would no longer feel that they could support it. This again could create a very confusing situation. All told, the net result of yesterday's discussion, however, was that considerable progress was made both on the subject of the priority to be given to the Indian resolution and on the substance of it as opposed to the one submitted by the 21-powers. We shall continue to endeavour to gain priority for the Indian resolution and to make it acceptable to as many countries as possible both within the 21-power group and without.

17. The press is naturally aware of the discussions now being conducted by the 21-powers and by the sub-committee. They are also aware of the Canadian support for the Indian resolution. Since we seem to be the first country having given our qualified support to the Indian scheme, it is quite normal that we be singled out by the United States delegation and should naturally expect that considerable pressure will be brought to bear on us. We shall continue to give our general support to the efforts of the Indian delegation, bearing in mind that we should not overlook serious opposition to it from United States or other quarters.

TWENTY-ONE POWER SUB-COMMITTEE ON KOREA

Reference: Our telegram No. 312 of November 19.

Addressed Ottawa No. 326, repeated Washington No. 96.

The sub-committee of the 21-power group met immediately after Menon's statement to the first committee. A meeting which was scheduled for earlier in the day had been cancelled and we were under the impression that the United States delegation was likely to give more favourable consideration to the Indian resolution. Gross dispelled this impression by his presentation.

2. Gross stressed the importance of maintaining the "moral unity" of the 21-power group. He believed the task would have been simplified if the Indian draft had not been tabled in "unacceptable form". Such an action, according to him, created a political situation damaging to the necessary unity which should exist within the United Nations on Korea since (a) it tended to drive neutralists in the direction of the more intransigent side; our openness of mind had been taken as weakness; (b) it put us in the awkward position of having "to negotiate" with the Indian sponsor, even though we were not sure that Menon would continue support of his own resolution if it were amended; and (c) the Indian draft had deflected public opinion from the 21-power resolution which stated a simple moral principle in favour of a resolution which "took with one paragraph and gave with another." He did not believe that Menon's speech had clarified the Indian stand on the two basic issues of the umpire and the indefinite captivity of prisoners. If other members of the sub-committee believed that "concessions to vagueness" were necessary, there could be no meeting of minds so far as the United States delegation was concerned.

3. He stressed the importance of time itself, since, in his opinion, each day drove us further away from the possibility of using the 21-power resolution as the basis for the Assembly's action on Korea. He admitted the effect on public opinion which had been made by the Indian resolution. The United States delegation felt it important, therefore, "to bring the matter to a head" within the next 24 hours.

4. In a further effort to convince the sub-committee, Gross produced arguments similar to those reported in our telegram No. 291 of November 17 which had heretofore not been advanced in this group. He said that we could not consider the question of principle of non-forcible repatriation as the sole question which had to be included in an acceptable resolution on Korea. In rather laboured fashion, he moved into the realm of essential principles the two questions of indefinite retention of prisoners of war and the appointment of an umpire. The United States case, as it has been made privately to Mr. Pearson by United States spokesmen at the highest level, is gradually being made in the sub-committee. Gross added finally that, since Mr. Acheson intended to take a definite stand in his statement to the First Committee on Monday next, November 24, there should be agreement among the 21-power group before the weekend.

5. Gross submitted a further United States revision of paragraph 17 which read as follows — "within 90 days from the signing of the armistice agreement, any prisoner of war whose return to his homeland has not been effected in accordance with the procedures set out above shall be released by the Repatriation Commission.

The Repatriation Commission shall assist UNKRA in caring for such persons and in arranging for their settlement and return to peaceful pursuits."

6. Every member of the sub-committee stated their views and all stressed the importance of preventing a split between the United States and other members of the group. Jebb of the United Kingdom gave it as his opinion, however, that public opinion in the United Kingdom would simply not understand rejection of the Indian resolution and the explanation of its purposes given in Mr. Menon's "the moving speech". He believed that the point at issue had been narrowed down to paragraph 17 and he thought that Menon might well agree to a revision of that paragraph. He believed that if our principle of non-forcible repatriation was preserved, we should not worry about any credit accruing from sponsorship of the resolution and, for his part, he saw no difficulty in negotiating with Menon. He appealed to the United States not to insist on too many amendments to the Indian resolution since there was "some value in Menonese".

7. Hoppenot of France indicated that unless instructed to the contrary his delegation would vote in favour of priority for the Indian proposals and for the resolution itself whether amendments to it were accepted by Menon or not. He did not believe that the United States amendments should be made the sine qua non for acceptance of the Indian resolution.

8. Mr. Martin said he had found Menon disposed to accept all reasonable points of view in his many talks with him and he believed that Lloyd and himself could convince Menon to accept amendments to paragraph 17 which could be acceptable to the United States.

9. The representatives of Colombia, Turkey and Denmark took less definite stands, although it is probably safe to say that they would vote against the Indian draft if the United States were to do so. Spender of Australia was obviously in a very difficult position. He felt it was unwise to stand against the flow of public opinion which was in support of the Indian resolution and yet he was most unwilling to commit his country to any action which would run counter to that taken by the United States. He stressed, therefore, the need to examine closely the suggested United States amendments to the Indian draft (our letter 45 of November 19),† decide on whether the 21-power group accepted these amendments and then insist upon Menon's acceptance of these amendments in return for our support of the Indian resolution.

10. The sub-committee will meet again at the call of the chair at which time representatives are expected to state their positions with respect to the substance of the suggested United States amendments.

11. Mr. Pearson talked with Gross late last night and got the impression that he at least was not nearly as adamantly opposed to the Indian resolution or as devoted to the "principles" as his performance in the sub-committee would suggest. This leaves us and more particularly the sub-committee in difficulties as to how to interpret the strength of the United States stand.

Following from the Minister, Begins: Please cable following message immediately to our High Commissioner in New Delhi, Begins: As you know, we have been working very closely with the Indians here on their Korean resolution and have reached a point of strong disagreement with the United States in respect of it. The Americans insist on certain amendments which it is doubtful if the Indians can accept. There is one point which has a bearing on this and where you may be able to help, namely, has the Indian Government received anything authoritative in regard to the Chinese reaction to their resolution? What are its chances of acceptance in Peking? The Indian delegation will, of course, let us know here what they get from New Delhi, but it is possible that by a direct intervention, which would have to be very tactfully done, you might be able to secure earlier and more complete information. I would not, however, wish the Indian delegation here to know that we had asked you to attempt to secure such information, so you will have to enquire without referring to the source of this message. ## KOREAN NEGOTIATIONS

Reference: Your teletypes No. 307 and 291.

Following for the Minister from the Under-Secretary, Begins: You will by now have seen the comments of the Chairman of the Chiefs of Staff contained in our teletype No. 146 of November 19. For our part, we have thus far refrained from commenting on reports received from yourself and from the Delegation, (a) because the developments in New York have been so rapid that our comments might have been obsolete when received by you, and (b) because we have been in full agreement with the position adopted by yourself and by the Delegation in the behind-the-scenes negotiations. The only exception to this has been our teletype EX 100 of November 10, which contained a preliminary analysis of the Indian proposal, prepared in the Department.

2. We consider that the final draft of the Indian proposal is a considerable improvement over the original rather nebulous ideas outlined by Krishna Menon. It seems to us that, with the acceptance of those amendments which can be agreed upon by the eight-power sub-committee of the twenty-one powers, the Indian proposal will provide as good a resolution as can be expected. However, we are still uncertain as to the attitude of Peking towards the Indian proposal. In the Delegation's teletype No. 101 of October 28 Krishna Menon is reported as stating that he could produce proof within a week's time that the Chinese Communists were anxious to secure an armistice but, as far as we know, he has not produced this proof.

3. This point raises a problem to which you have no doubt already given careful consideration. It is possible that the Soviet bloc may indicate to Menon that they will accept his proposal if it is amended in several apparently minor features. It also seems quite probable that Menon is now in a mood to accept eagerly such amendments from the Communist side, and perhaps to discount the significance of such amendments. On the other hand, it seems quite possible that he will reject the most important of the amendments put forward by the United States. The situation may thus develop where we will be faced with a Soviet-amended version of the Indian resolution, which would be completely unacceptable to the United States, but which it might be difficult for us to oppose in view of our support for the Indian proposal in its present form. This, of course, would place us in a dilemma, as you will realize better than we do. In our opinion, the only way out of this dilemma would be either (a) to amend the twenty-one power resolution in a manner acceptable to India, by including the substance of Menon's proposals; or (b) to have the Indians accept a sufficient number of the amendments proposed by the United States so that the latter will not vote against the Indians. We realize that this is precisely the purpose of the meetings which are now taking place behind the scenes in New York. But, for the reason given above, we think there is a very serious danger of the Soviet bloc seizing the initiative unless these meetings produce a text broadly acceptable both to the United States and to India.

4. On the points raised in your teletype No. 291, we completely agree with your statement that the Indian proposals can not be regarded as a "capitulation", and that the value of the armistice arrangements will ultimately depend on the good faith and intentions of the Communists. We can appreciate the desire of the Americans to keep up military pressure in order to secure a fool-proof armistice. We do not see, however, that there is any likelihood that sufficient military pressure can be brought to bear upon our opponents to compel them to accept terms to which they do not agree. A completely fool-proof armistice could only be secured once the enemy had been utterly defeated. At present, in view of the equal strength of the two sides, the only type of armistice obtainable is one which is broadly acceptable to both parties. The risk of such an armistice being broken would not be any greater whether it was secured as a result of the Indian proposals or of the proposals made by the Unified Command on September 28. In either case, our enemies could make use of the opportunity to build up their military forces and could find ample excuse to violate the armistice if they so desired. If the Communists were only interested in an armistice which they could use for building up military strength in order to eventually renew hostilities, they could have had one long ago by accepting our previous proposals. The fact that they are holding out for their own terms is, at least, an indication that they may desire a permanent armistice.

5. We can also understand the desire of the Americans to have the main issue completely agreed upon before the armistice. The Indian proposals do not provide for the ultimate disposition of the prisoners who do not choose to be repatriated. Would it not be possible to amend paragraph 17 of the Indian proposals in such a manner that it would be acceptable both to the Indians and the Americans, by including a statement that, if the political conference were unable to reach an agreement after another given period of time, the prisoners should be released?

6. In the various teletypes reporting the views of the United States officials, we find their continual emphasis on a "final and definitive" armistice somewhat confusing. Our understanding was that it was the recognition that any armistice would be pretty precarious which initially prompted the United States Government to consult with its allies on the question of issuing a "warning statement" to the Communists once the armistice had been concluded. We would be interested in having your views as to whether the position of the United States authorities on this matter has altered. Ends.

21-POWER MEETINGS ON KOREA — INDIAN RESOLUTION

Reference: Our telegram No. 326 of November 20.

Addressed External No. 348 (Important), repeated Washington No. 100

A further meeting of the sub-committee of the 21-Power group was held November 21, followed almost immediately by a meeting of the representatives of the 21-Powers. It was clear from the meetings that decisions will have to be taken this week-end as to the tactics to be followed with respect to the Indian resolution and on the substance of suggested United States amendments to the Indian resolution. The following summary of the meetings which telescopes the views expressed in the sub-committee and the main group is an attempt merely to record the views expressed rather than to analyze the immediate status of negotiations. Mr. Pearson is being kept informed of the activities of the committee and any stand that we find that we must take over the week-end will be cleared with him.

United States views in the sub-committee

2. We were given the clearest statement yet of the United States position with respect to the Indian draft resolution. Gross stated clearly that if the textual amendments to the Indian draft resolution suggested by the United States delegation were not agreed to in advance of the moment when the committee took its vote as to whether or not the Indian resolution would be given priority of consideration, the United States would adhere to the 21-Power resolution; not only must there be agreement in advance to the amendments but the text of those amendments must correspond to and carry out the desires of the United States Government with respect to non-forcible repatriation, the appointment of the umpire and the provision for release within a specified time limit of those prisoners of war who would resist repatriation. While the sub-committee did not discuss actual textual amendments, we believe that the United States has in mind those amendments which we forwarded to you under cover of our letter No. 45 of November 19.†

3. In the United States view, it "would have been and still may be" the wise course to support the 21-power resolution as one stating a simple moral issue which was understandable to world public opinion. Gross argued again that delay in agreement on the precise nature and text of amendments to the Indian resolution was prejudicial to the tactics favoured by the United States delegation, i.e. to give priority to the 21-power resolution.

4. Gross thought that even if the Indian resolution were to be adopted by the Assembly, without a clear statement of essentials, there would be a serious risk of deadlocking the armistice negotiations again on an administrative or procedural issue rather than on a point of principle, thus placing us in a much weaker moral and propaganda position. Gross devoted some attention to other amendments to the Indian resolution which the United States would regard as important and probably essential. In his opinion, there must be no provision for further negotiation of the Indian proposals if they were sent to the Communists; they must be accepted as a whole with provision only for arrangement of details within the confines of the proposals attached to the resolution. He argued that it would be unfair to bind the United Nations command to a set of General Assembly proposals leaving the other side free to use them merely as a starting point and a spring board for demands for further concessions. The United States thought it equally important that the proposals of the Indian resolution should not be considered a separate repatriation agreement but should be included in the general armistice agreement. Finally, the United States delegation believed that the reference to the letter of October 16 (paragraph 5 of the Indian resolution) should be omitted since that letter provided for classification by each side; we should insist that classification be carried out by the repatriation commission only.

5. At one point in the sub-committee's discussions, the French representative asked Gross directly whether the United States would agree to designating India as the fifth member of the repatriation commission in the course of the First Committee's discussion of the Indian resolution. Gross evaded a direct answer on the question of the suitability of India although he did agree that many of the problems for the United States with respect to the repatriation commission would be cleared up if the five-member commission was appointed prior to forwarding the proposals to the Communists. He did not, however, by anything he said, rule out the possibility of United States acceptance of India for this role.

United States views in 21-power meeting

6. Gross repeated the views set out above at the full meeting of the 21-powers and added a few more comments. He stated that the United States was troubled by the attempt to force the United Nations as a body to negotiate with the Communists; the United Nations should rather state principles which had to be met by the enemy. He thought the Communists would take heart from our action "in extorting concessions from one another" and interpret that action as weakness where moral solidarity should exist. He suggested that the future course of the United Nations in Korea might well be in the balance.

7. He made reference to an Associated Press despatch concerning the sub-committee's meeting an hour earlier, which suggested that the eight members had agreed to give priority to the Indian resolution. He said his delegation would deny that categorically. He maintained that this development proved the validity of the United States argument concerning the effect of the passage of time. He concluded his interventions by asserting that the United States did not intend to issue any ultimatum with respect to the acceptance of its amendments, but his delegation had to be able to take a definite stand by Monday when Mr. Acheson is scheduled to speak, and he left the clear implication that in fact the United States was issuing an ultimatum.

Views of other members in the sub-committee

8. The chairman and rapporteur (Spender and Shann) had prepared a paper for the sub-committee's consideration, attempting to set out in non-controversial terms the broad requirements concerning amendments to be introduced to the Indian resolution which appeared to arise from the earlier meetings of the sub-committee. Lloyd of the United Kingdom, with some support from ourselves and the French, argued that we should not make our stand with respect to priority for the Indian resolution completely dependent on acceptance by the Indian representative of all the amendments suggested, as was the clear intent of the words used in Spender's paper. Similarly, Lloyd argued against the advisability of setting out clearly in the Indian resolution the fact that in the event of disagreement on the appointment of the umpire, the General Assembly should make that appointment. He believed that such a spelling out would make the proposal completely unacceptable from the beginning to the Communists and implied that, while in our own minds we might regard the issue of the umpire as a breaking point, we should at least allow for vagueness on the question for the period of the three weeks provided for in the Indian resolution with the hope that in fact some agreement could be reached with the Communists in that time. Lloyd questioned the tactical advantage of giving prominence to the principle of non-forcible repatriation in negotiations which might arise at Panmunjom on the basis of the Indian proposals.

9. The United Kingdom, France and Canada were unwilling to commit themselves at this stage to full support of the United States amendments regardless of their effect on the Indian resolution. Australia, on the other hand, was willing to offer that commitment to the United States to gain its adherence to the Indian resolution. The representative of Turkey gave us the impression that he was still flexible while the representatives of Colombia and Denmark were much closer to the United States position.

Views of other members in the 21-power meeting

10. There was a lack of intelligent comment from the other thirteen members of the group, understandable because of the lack of information in their possession on the exact differences of opinion which had been aired in the sub-committee. The United Kingdom spokesmen (Mr. Eden was present at the meeting) repeated their view that it would be a mistake to become committed too soon and too rigidly on the question of amendments. They believed that the worst possible method of procedure would be to issue an ultimatum to the Indians immediately and publicly with respect to the amendments. They suggested that the best course would be to attempt to persuade the Indians privately to incorporate some of the amendments into their resolution and thought that that effort should be made within the next 48 hours.

11. It was fairly clear that New Zealand is likely to support the position taken by the United Kingdom, France and Canada.

12. The 21-power meeting adjourned with rather indefinite plans for its next meeting although there was general agreement that it should meet if possible before Monday, November 24, to reach its decision with respect to the United States amendments.

In almost continuous talks with Menon for the last 12 hours it has become clear that while he is willing to make some further changes to paragraph 14 and 17 along lines which the Americans desire, he will not go as far as they wish. Certainly it is clear that if paragraph 17 is amended to state specifically that prisoners should be released if agreement is not reached after a given period of time, the Indians will abandon the resolution completely. They are doubtful whether the Chinese will support it as it stands. They are certain that they would turn it down flatly if the above amendment were carried. Ends.

TWENTY-ONE POWER MEETING ON KOREA

Reference: Our telegram No. 348 of November 22.

Addressed External No. 364 repeated Washington No. 106.

The 21-power group met again on Sunday evening, November 23, at the insistence of the United States delegation. It met against a background of press reports headlining "the serious split" between the United States and the United Kingdom on the Indian resolution. It was further dramatized by the attention given to Mr. Acheson's "sudden return flight" from Ottawa.<sup>54</sup> As representatives entered the United States delegations's headquarters where the meeting was held they were met by dozens of reporters with usual paraphernalia.

2. The meeting did not bear out the expectation of the press that "fireworks" would develop. All representatives who spoke at the meeting, including Mr. Acheson, decried the exaggerated press reports concerning the division of opinion. You will note from story beginning on page 1 of today's New York Times that "the newspaper accounts were based on the United States delegation's own account of the conversations" between Mr. Gross and Mr. Eden. Mr. Eden was not present at last night's meeting because he had a more important engagement. The fact that the Indian delegation had earlier in the afternoon made public, revisions of paragraphs 14 and 17 of their resolution underlined the wisdom of the tactics which had been suggested by the United Kingdom and ourselves for bringing the two points of view closer together. The texts of the revised paragraphs are contained in my immediately following telegram.

3. The United States position with respect to the Indian resolution was described by Mr. Acheson in much less adamant terms than heretofore. He agreed that the United States point with respect to the umpire was met in Menon's revision of paragraph 14. He did not, however, believe that there was any substantial improvement in paragraph 17 since, according to his interpretation of it, the "hard core" of prisoners would still be sent to the political conference; there was no specific end to the period of their detention; and the authority to dispose of them remained in the hands of the political conference. Acheson said he did not like the referral of these prisoners of war to the political conference although he had referred the question to his government and had therefore to reserve his stand on it. He insisted, however, that there must be a time limit in the resolution after which the authority of the political conference over the prisoners of war would be terminated and he suggested that paragraph 17 should provide for some point in time when the prisoners would be released to some group with authority to resettle them and that that group should be specified, e.g. UNKRA. He argued that he was attempting merely to bring Menon's resolution into accord with Menon's speech since Menon had in fact argued that no human being could be kept in indefinite detention. At several points in his intervention Mr. Acheson stressed the importance in the United States view of making the period of detention of the hard core of prisoners of war as short as possible. In the revised Indian resolution a period of 150 days was already provided for; there was, therefore, almost half a year during which the Communists could build up their military strength without interference by the United Nations Command; final decisions for the release of the prisoners of war therefore would be taken under conditions of increasing Communist military pressure; this was a main concern of the military. He said, in addition, that the United States would regard it as important (although he distinguished between important and essential) that the words "by the Repatriation Commission" should be added to paragraph 5 of the Indian proposals.

4. Lloyd for the United Kingdom stressed the need to put the differences of opinion in the group in the right perspective for the press. For his part he had "never conceded that there was a difference on principles" although he did admit that there had been "arguments as to methods of approach." He agreed that paragraph 17 was still open to criticism along the lines of Mr. Acheson's remarks although he stressed that its revision was an important step in the direction of meeting our views. While he hoped that further revisions might be possible he indicated that the United Kingdom would be willing "in the ultimate resort" to have the Indian resolution go to the Communists in its present form. He argued strongly that so far as tactics were concerned the 21-power group should agree to accord priority of consideration to the Indian resolution "freely and generously" and then by "pressure of debate" seek further desirable changes in the Indian resolution. He again stressed the view that the amendments should not be put forward publicly as the sine qua non of acceptance of the Indian resolution even though there might be agreement among the 21-powers that certain amendments were still necessary.

5. At one point in the meeting Acheson, with deceptive naivety, asked Lloyd what his advice would be concerning the statement which he, Acheson, was scheduled to make in the Political Committee today. Lloyd, with suitable diffidence, suggested that Mr. Acheson might develop a statement along the following lines. He might applaud the initiative of the Indian Government but suggest that he would like some further points of clarification with respect to paragraph 17 along the lines set down above. Lloyd thought he should avoid producing alternative texts. He suggested in effect that Mr. Acheson should make two statements, the first of which would follow the line set out above. The second statement would concern alternative forms of words after the "pressure of debate in the First Committee" had been brought to bear on Menon. Mr. Acheson did not comment on these suggestions.

6. Lloyd's point of view was supported in greater or lesser degree by Canada, France, Australia, New Zealand and the Netherlands. The Netherlands representative suggested that the Indian resolution went further than the original 21-power resolution in attempting to solve the problem of the hard core of prisoners of war who would resist repatriation, a problem which would arise in whatever resolution was agreed upon. Mr. Martin developed this point and argued that with all its inadequacies the Indian proposal did at least make an attempt to deal with a problem which the 21-power resolution ignored.

7. The opposing view on priority for the Indian resolution before firm agreement on textual revision had been reached with the Indian representative was put forward by the representatives of the Philippines, Greece, Honduras, Thailand and Turkey. At one stage the meeting was dangerously close to developing into a drafting committee, a development which was headed off by Sir Percy Spender as chairman. The more important suggestions with respect to amendment of paragraph 17 concerned the replacement of the words "the responsibility for their care and maintenance until the end of their detention shall be transferred to the United Nations" by one of two forms of words (a) "the responsibility for their disposition shall be transferred to the United Nations", or, simply (b) "responsibility for them shall be transferred to the United Nations."

8. In summary the United States desire for further revision of paragraph 17 could be expressed in the following terms:

(a) If the political conference were to take over the problem of the hard core of prisoners of war the period of its responsibility should not be indeterminate;

(b) Some definite provision for a United Nations body should be included; and

(c) There should be a definite period after which the prisoners of war could be released from all custody.

Lloyd did not show any fundamental disagreement with these terms. Any difference of view which continued to exist was centered on the point made in (c) above. Whereas the United States would wish the prisoners of war to be released after a definite period the United Kingdom would be satisfied with a wording which would merely provide that the prisoners of war should not be detained indefinitely.

9. The meeting ended on a somewhat indefinite note with the understanding that a further meeting would be called when the situation with respect to further amendment of paragraph 17 was clearer. We believe that the meeting can be regarded as satisfactory from our point of view in that the United States did not, as we expected they might have, force individual representatives to take a stand on priority for the Indian resolution only if suitable amendments were accepted by Menon. On the other hand — and this is unfortunate from our point of view — neither the United States nor a number of the 21-power group have agreed to accord priority to the Indian resolution.

10. The following is the text of the communique which was issued after the meeting:

"The twenty-one powers who sponsored the original resolution on Korea which came before the First Committee (the Assembly's Political Committee) on October 24 met tonight to study further the draft of the revised Indian resolution in the light of their own resolution and other resolutions before the committee. They took special note of important revisions to the draft resolution which the Indian delegation made public today. There was agreement that these revisions clarified in certain important respects the original Indian proposal but it was considered they require further study and clarification on certain aspects. There was unanimous agreement on the basic problems involved."

21-POWER MEETING ON KOREA

Reference: My teletype No. 373 of November 25.†

Addressed External No. 376, repeated Washington No. 113.

The 21 powers met November 25 to decide their stand with respect to the granting of priority to the Indian resolution. The meeting was the most amiable yet of meetings of this group a development due in the main to behind-the-scenes talks.

2. Mr. Acheson led off by saying that he would keep his "inner most thoughts" to himself in case the "more intimate details" of these discussions should once again reach the press. He indicated that his delegation would favour the granting of priority to the Indian resolution and he thought it would be a mistake to condition it on agreements binding on all 21 powers with respect to particular amendments. He pointed out that the United States position was clear and would remain clear; that "certain clarifications" of paragraph 17 were necessary but that there should be no impression given of pressure tactics to achieve these clarifications.

3. Acheson was strongly supported in his view by Selwyn Lloyd. Lloyd went on to develop the point that a new factor had been introduced in that Vishinsky had condemned the Indian resolution publicly. In his opinion, such a Soviet action predisposed him, aside from the merits of the Indian resolution, to give priority to it. He agreed that it would be a mistake to make priority conditional upon specific amendment although he thought that every delegation within and without the 21-power group remained free to seek clarification of the resolution.

4. The representatives of the Philippines, Greece, Honduras, Ethiopia and Turkey were quick to follow the lead of the United States and the United Kingdom and repent their former stand of opposition to the grant of priority to the Indian resolution without firm agreement on amendments to it which might be considered necessary. The problem of the attitude of delegations outside the 21-power group was discussed and it was agreed that we could do little to influence the line which they might take with respect to amendments.

5. The representative of the Netherlands suggested that Menon's position might be made more difficult if suggestions for amendments came from the 21-power group and he believed that "some sort of priority" might be given to representatives of countries not included in the 21-power group and particularly to "India's neighbours" to suggest amendments.

6. Mr. Martin stated clearly that Canada supported the idea of priority for the Indian resolution. He said in addition that Canada believed there was a certain urgency in passing that resolution. He supported the point of view put forward by the representative of the Netherlands and he expressed the hope that there would be no undue amount of requests for clarification in order that the Indian resolution might keep its present character. He stressed that this latter point was almost as important as the question of priority itself. We did not want to lose Indian sponsorship of the resolution which is finally adopted by the First Committee. In subsequent exchange with the representatives of New Zealand and the United Kingdom, Mr. Martin agreed that his idea was that the maximum number of statements might be made on the minimum number of points, i.e. that suggested amendments to the Indian draft be kept to minimum while exposing Menon to what Lloyd has constantly referred to in these meetings as the "pressure of debate."

7. The meeting ended with some discussion of the kind of press communique which would be issued. Mr. Acheson made the original suggestion for wording which was subsequently amended by Lloyd and others. The text as it was finally agreed to was the following:

"The twenty-one co-sponsors of the resolution of the 24th of October 1952 met this afternoon and unanimously reached agreement that priority in the voting should be given to the resolution tabled by the delegation of India on the 17th of November 1952 and revised on the 23rd of November 1952. It was understood also that necessary textual clarifications on paragraph 17 will be sought to make it conform to the intention of the paragraph as outlined in statements made in the committee."

8. This is a satisfactory development from our point of view, one for which we probably have to thank Mr. Vishinsky. There may still be a few hurdles ahead. We intend to participate in the debate at an early stage in order to give the kind of leadership we think would be helpful in surmounting the hurdles and in helping the Indian resolution through.

SECRET.

Following from the Minister, Begins: The purpose of this message is to summarize the behind-the-scenes discussions which took place yesterday and earlier today concerning Article 17 of the draft Indian resolution, on which, after days of negotiation, substantial agreement has now finally been reached, I hope, between Menon, the Americans, the United Kingdom and ourselves.

2. On Tuesday evening there had been lengthy discussions between Selwyn Lloyd and Menon, and later myself, as the result of which it was thought that by midnight agreement had been reached on the following re-draft of the last sentence of this contentious paragraph: "If at the end of a further sixty (thirty) days there are any prisoners of war whose return to their homelands has not been effected under the above procedures or whose future has not been provided for by the political conference, the responsibility for their care and maintenance and for their subsequent disposition shall be transferred to the United Nations which in all matters relating to them shall act (strictly) in accordance with international law" or alternatively, instead of "...responsibility for their care and maintenance and for their subsequent disposition...", merely the words: "...responsibility for them shall be transferred...etc."

3. Before leaving yesterday morning for the Assembly, I saw Menon and Lloyd again separately: and throughout the day participated either alone or with Mr. Martin in a continuous series of two and three-way discussions until midnight. The principal difficulties arose from:

(i) The fact that overnight Menon decided that the alternative re-draft regarding United Nations responsibility was preferable. The Americans, however, preferred the longer form which included the word "disposition" and overnight had secured the agreement of Washington on these words;

(ii) The American desire after consultation with Washington to include after "in accordance with" the words "the principles of this resolution" along with those of "international law".

(iii) The American insistence on "30" instead of "60" days in the first line. Menon after overnight consideration would not accept this.

(iv) The American feeling that the inclusion of the word "strictly" was unnecessary and even silly.

4. In discussions yesterday, Lloyd and I tried to explain the Indian difficulties to the Americans on the 60 or 30 days point, but they made it clear that the 30 day period was regarded as essential by the United States Chiefs of Staff, that they could not modify their position without going back to Washington on this point, and that this would probably require a reference to the President. The United States side, therefore, held firm to a reference to the 30 day period. On the other hand, during the afternoon, the Americans agreed to accept the word "strictly" and at the same time to delete the bracketed words "the principles of this resolution" to which they had appeared to attach importance, for reasons as mystical as Menon's attachment to "strictly". Obviously these two points were not ones of substance, but so great have been the difficulties in this complex problem, and so deep the mistrust between Menon and the United States side that even minor drafting changes have proved capable of raising real difficulties.

5. So far as the major points are concerned, we had thought by midday, and after several discussions and cups of tea with Menon, that he would be able to accept the shorter period of thirty days required by the Americans, and also the United Nations responsibility for "disposition". Immediately before the First Committee meeting at 3 o'clock, however, Menon informed me that after conferring with his delegation, he would stand though reluctantly, by the "disposition" phrase, but he would not be able to make the change from "60" to "30" days in the revision of the last sentence of paragraph 17 of his resolution. Later however, he said that he would not oppose this change if it were proposed from the floor of the committee. I then saw Gross (United States) and Lloyd (United Kingdom). Gross was disturbed at the prospect of any further alterations but I explained to him that this involved only a change of form and not of substance, as it should be easy to get someone to move the amendment and the committee would undoubtedly approve it. It was merely a question of whether the change would come about by an Indian revision of their draft or from the floor. Gross then took the matter up at once with Acheson who was attending the committee. Later he expressed Acheson's annoyance at this further suggested change, although he finally accepted the Indian position. Accordingly, when the Indian re-draft of paragraph 17 with "60 days" appeared late yesterday, there appeared also a Danish amendment to reduce the period to "30 days".

7. That was how the matter stood when I met Menon, Lloyd and Nervo (Mexico) with Mr. Martin last evening. It was a discouraging meeting as Menon showed signs of desiring to withdraw from the whole business because of his government's uneasiness at the interpretation now being given in India to their amended resolution; namely, that the United States had forced these concessions and that India had been pushed off her position of neutrality in the cold war.

8. Menon was obviously unhappy about his final draft and also feels he may not be able to vote against the Soviet amendments to it. We emphasized that this was no time to falter or show weakness. I suggested also that most of the Soviet amendments were obviously out of order and could be ruled so by the chairman, if that would help. The resulting procedural discussion, which we had previously desired to avoid, might now be an advantage. Menon grasped at this straw, especially as he will not now be able to speak for a couple of days and delay is desirable. The Americans last evening had discussed this procedural question with the Latin Americans and they had agreed not to raise in the committee whether or not the Soviet amendments were in order. I talked to Acheson and Hickerson this morning, however, and they now realize the difficulty and agree that a procedural ruling might be desirable, especially as it might remove the embarrassment of a vote against a Russian amendment which provides for an immediate cease fire. I have also talked this matter over with the chairman of the First Committee and Nervo of Mexico. The latter would like to see the question of the admissibility of the Soviet amendments raised, and the former said that if it were raised he would rule the 2nd and 3rd amendments definitely out of order as repeating the terms of the Soviet resolution which was subsequently to be voted on.

9. I saw Mrs. Pandit and Menon again this afternoon and they remain unhappy and worried about the present state of their resolution after the vicious attacks made on it by the Communists and the satisfaction of the United States and others over the amendments that have been made and accepted. Ends.

May I be permitted to tell you how greatly encouraged those of us who are working at the United Nations Assembly to bring about an armistice and peace in Korea were by your recent statements in New Delhi on this subject. Your representative here has, if I may say so, been handling with skill, integrity and patience what we now think of as the Indian peace initiative. I realize that he has been criticized from both extremes, but I feel certain myself that the resolution which, while it stands in the name of your delegation, expresses the feelings of nearly all delegations, does represent a real advance toward a peaceful solution of this problem. Even if the initial reaction in Peking is unsatisfactory, nevertheless, if this resolution, which does not involve a surrender of principle by any party, is approved by the Assembly, as I am sure it will be, it will provide a new and far better basis for armistice and peace talks in the future than any which has hitherto been attempted or contemplated. In that respect, I am sure it establishes good and sound foundations on which to build. As such it is heartily welcomed by all delegations here who are sincere in their desire for peace in Korea.

2. If and when it becomes a resolution of the Assembly, it imposes certain responsibilities on me as President in regard to its transmission to Peking and North Korea. I venture to express the hope that at that time I may be able to count on the support of yourself and your government in helping to gain for it the most favourable reception possible, and in giving to the Chinese the interpretation and explanation to which it is entitled, as a significant step forward towards the peaceful solution of the Korean question.

With reference to immediately preceding telegram regarding Indian Korean initiative, United Nations Assembly, for your information I am sending this message because I am worried lest Menon should not get the backing from Delhi which he needs to push this initiative through. It has been a valuable and constructive step by India, and it would be deplorable if there were any faltering now, irrespective of the reception in Peking. We have had very great difficulty with the Americans in persuading them to accept the resolution, but the few changes which have been made to satisfy them are not important and do not represent any retreat by the Indian delegation from their original position. I hope that the amendment to paragraph 17 is not being interpreted in New Delhi in this way. I think Menon is worried about this, and that the final resolution may appear to be forced on him by American pressure. This is not the case, as I can testify from having spent many long hours with him recently. Ends.<sup>58</sup>

The Prime Minister added that there is indeed no, repeat no, alternative to pressing ahead with the resolution and while you cannot force peace on people who do not, repeat not, want it you can create conditions making it easier for people to come to agreement and this the resolution does.

Dear Mr. St. Laurent,

There was another crisis the other evening in the struggle over the Indian resolution. Mr. Menon was very discouraged by the reception given in this country and in his own to the amendments which he had been persuaded to accept. In this country, newspapers interpreted them as an American triumph, and in India, in certain quarters, as an Indian defeat. Menon, who is very moody and temperamental, was on the point of withdrawing from the whole business. However, I told him that I would send a personal telegram at once to Mr. Nehru, which would emphasize the value of the initiative which had been taken, and the desirability of pressing ahead with it. Menon cheered up over this, and thought that it would be helpful. As it turned out, it was, because I received yesterday a very friendly reply from Mr. Nehru, which removed from Menon's mind any temptation to weaken in the sponsorship and support of the Indian resolution.

It would have been a fine thing if we could have proceeded to the vote in respect of that resolution yesterday, but once again Menon faltered and pleaded for the weekend for "contemplation and preparation". He will be giving his final statement Monday, and the vote should be taken in the afternoon.

Yours sincerely,

CONFIDENTIAL

FIRST COMMITTEE DEBATE — INDIAN RESOLUTION ON KOREA

Addressed External No. 412, repeated Washington No. 124.

After a series of some 25 votes on separate paragraphs and amendments, the Indian resolution on Korea, as revised by the Danish amendment, was passed by the First Committee with a vote of 53 in favour, including Canada, 5 against, the Soviet Bloc, and one abstention, China. The vote came after lengthy statements by Menon for India and Vishinsky for the Soviet Union. Menon spoke in his usual discursive manner and attempted to preserve his neutral position with respect to the views of the main protagonists in the Korean struggle. Vishinsky reiterated his familiar criticisms of the Indian resolution and described it as "a rotten compromise".

2. So far as the voting was concerned, most of the paragraphs of the Indian resolution received the support of 53 or 54 members and most of the Soviet amendments were defeated by a vote of 46 against. In the case of the latter, a group of eight countries abstained, Afghanistan, Burma, Egypt, Indonesia, Iran, Saudi Arabia, Syria and Yemen. In each case, Canada voted with the majority whether in favour of the various paragraphs of the Indian resolution or against the separate Soviet amendments. India did not flinch in face of voting against the cease-fire concept in the Soviet proposals, voting in each case against the Soviet amendments.

3. In the course of his statement, Menon asked the representatives of Iraq, Greece and Denmark to withdraw their amendments. The Greek and Iranian amendments were withdrawn but the Danish amendment, reducing from 60 to 30 days the period in which the political conference would consider the disposition of those prisoners who refuse to be repatriated, remained before the Committee and was eventually adopted by a vote of 39 in favour, including Canada, 5 against, the Soviet Bloc, with 14 abstentions, including India.

4. Menon, after noting "the significant absences" from the United Nations of Chinese and North Korean representatives, addressed a particular appeal to "the audience of the Chinese mainland." He distinguished between the Indian resolution and the Panmunjom proposals. He offered answers to each of the objections raised by the Soviet Bloc to his resolution and he dealt with the Soviet amendments by suggesting that all of their provisions were included in his resolution. He ended his statement with an emotional appeal to the Committee, and particularly to the Soviet Union, to open the door for peace in Korea.

5. Vishinsky offered criticism of the Indian draft along the lines which had become familiar to the Committee. He devoted a good deal of his statement to the issue of an immediate cease-fire, asserting that it was "ludicrous and incompatible to open the door to peace while hostilities continued." He contested India's claim to speak for the Asian continent. He managed to return to the question of forcible screening on Kojima Island and made great play of the article by William Stevenson which appeared in the November 22 issue of the Toronto Star Weekly. He referred, in addition, to a letter to the President of the General Assembly from the Editor of the Canadian Tribune which itself made reference to the Stevenson article.

6. Lloyd of the United Kingdom pointed out that in his remark to the Committee earlier in the debate he had reported the results of his interview with prisoners of war in a camp near Pusan and he had made no reference to questioning prisoners of war on Kojima Island.

7. The President suggested suspension of the item until a reply was received from the Chinese and North Korean authorities. Vishinsky would not accept this suggestion and insisted that his draft resolution was still before the Committee and must be voted on. The President agreed that it would be put to vote on December 2. Iran, Mexico and Peru underscored the point that the other resolutions would still remain on the agenda although consideration of the item would be adjourned until a reply came to the Indian resolution.

8. A fuller account of the statements made by Menon and Vishinsky will be forwarded by despatch.

Please forward following message to the Canadian High Commissioner, New Delhi, Begins: Will you please see that the following message gets to Mr. Nehru immediately, Begins:

I am most grateful to you for your kind and helpful message of November 28th on Korea. The Assembly this afternoon passed the resolution on this matter which your delegation introduced, and which it has steered through the Committee so patiently and wisely. It requests me to transmit the proposals to Peking, and the North Korean authorities, and this I desire to do at once. The question of method, however, is, as I know you will agree, very important. I would like to send with the resolution an explanatory and objective communication, pointing out its importance for peace in Korea, and trying to remove some misunderstandings concerning the proposals. The question arises how the resolution and this accompanying message should be delivered; whether I should merely cable it direct or have it delivered by hand. If the latter, and I think this would be the better procedure, would I be able to use your Embassy in Peking for the purpose? If you think this is possible and desirable, then the message could be delivered by your Ambassador on my behalf, as President of the Assembly. In your earlier message, you were good enough to state that we should follow up this resolution and take full advantage of it. It would be most helpful, for that purpose, if your Government, through your Embassy in Peking, could also urge its importance and acceptability on the Chinese Government. Indeed, if Mr. Menon himself were in Peking, I know he would be in a very good position to remove many of the Chinese misapprehensions and misunderstandings which exist or have been created about it. Ends.

In connection with above message, I am not asking the Indian Government or the Indian Ambassador to act as my representative as President of the Assembly in explaining the resolution, but merely as a channel of communication in delivering it. However, the value of this procedure would be the explanation and follow-up which they might give to the resolution on their own behalf. I am sure the Indian Government will appreciate this. It has been suggested that Menon might take the resolution to Peking as my representative, but I can see difficulties in this regard. We would have to be very careful not to be put in a position where a United Nations representative was not treated with due courtesy and consideration. However, it might be useful if Menon were in Peking as an Indian Government representative at the time of delivery to the Chinese or shortly after. I would be grateful, therefore, if you would sound out the Indian Government whether there is any likelihood of this happening, following up the tentative suggestion which I made in the message.

You should be aware, if you are not already, that Madame Pandit and Menon do not apparently see eye to eye in all these matters, and I do not know what reports Madame Pandit has been sending to her brother concerning Menon's initiative and tactics, or how she would regard Menon's appearance at Peking at this time and in the above connection. Obviously the matter is one of delicacy from more than one point of view and any initiative by you on my behalf, as suggested above, will have to be done delicately and carefully.

I am most grateful to you for your speedy and effective action in connection with my previous message. Ends.

it. For this the goodwill of the Chinese Government is necessary. Even if this may not, repeat not, be forthcoming immediately I hope that at a somewhat later stage the Chinese Government will appreciate that the resolution does not, repeat not, do any violence to their principles and can certainly lead to a satisfactory and honourable settlement. We shall instruct our Embassy in Peking to work to this end.

I feel, however, that it would probably be more desirable for the resolution and your proposed explanatory memorandum not, repeat not, to be conveyed to Chinese Government through the Indian Embassy. We have no, repeat no, objections to doing so but it seems to me that the Indian Embassy will be in a better position to explain the resolution and your memorandum to the Chinese Government if these were conveyed to the Chinese Government through other means. The resolution might be sent en clair directly by you as President of the Assembly to the Government of Peking and North Korea. If you wish to send your memorandum also en clair then there is no, repeat no, difficulty and this could also be sent directly. If however, you wish to send the memorandum by code then it might be sent to Peking through the representative of some other country. This may be Sweden. I do not, repeat not, see how you can send any code message to North Korea.

We should like to have a copy of the memorandum so that we can send it to our Ambassador in Peking who could then follow it up. You can rest assured that we shall do our utmost in this matter. But as you say, the question of the method to be adopted for transmission of the proposal is very important. It seems to me that the suggestions I have made above are, in the circumstances, probably the best. Ends.

Government has already, as announced in official statement of November 29 (see my telegram No. 265 of December 1)† given Chinese Government clarification of resolution in an effort to remove the Chinese "misunderstanding" and Prime Minister therefore considers it would be wise for the Indian Government not, repeat not, to be associated with initial presentation of resolution to Chinese Government but to hold its fire especially since Chinese have already replied to Indians that they do not, repeat not, "misunderstand" the resolution.

2. On receipt of Prime Minister's reply I suggested to Foreign Secretary the importance of Indian Government intervening before Chinese gave an intransigent reply. He was sympathetic. ## ACTION ON KOREA IN PLENARY SESSION

Addressed Ottawa No. 444, repeated Washington No. 133.

1. The Indian resolution on Korea adopted by the First Committee on December 1 was considered in plenary session of the General Assembly on December 3 and with one amendment was adopted by a vote of 54 in favour, including Canada, 5 against, the Soviet Bloc, and one abstention, China.

2. The Indian delegation submitted an amendment to the resolution which was circulated just as the delegates took their seats. The amendment was submitted to the last paragraph of the preamble and was adopted by a vote of 53 in favour, including Canada, with none against and five abstentions. The paragraph referred to now reads as follows:

"Accordingly requests the President of the General Assembly to communicate the following proposals to the Central Peoples Government of the Peoples Republic of China and to the North Korean Committee as forming a just and reasonable basis for agreement so that an immediate cease-fire would result and be effected; to invite their acceptance of these proposals and to make a report to the General Assembly during its present session and as soon as appropriate."

Spender of Australia expressed the view that the placing of the Indian amendment in the resolution might lead to misinterpretation and suggested that the amending phrase should be inserted at the end of the paragraph. Menon of India indicated that he would like the amendment to remain where it was and since Spender had not insisted on his point the Indian view prevailed.

3. The Soviet Union reintroduced its amendments and its resolution in the plenary session. The amendments were all defeated by votes of 46 or more against. The Soviet resolution was disposed of by a vote of 5 in favour, the Soviet Bloc, 40 against including Canada, and 11 abstentions, the Arab-Asian Bloc including India and with 4 delegations absent.

4. Each of the delegations of the Soviet Bloc spoke against the Indian resolution, using the arguments with which the First Committee had become familiar and making the general charge that the resolution could only lead to prolongation of hostilities in Korea. Menon spoke briefly for India and defended his resolution against the Soviet charges. He said that his amendment was in the nature of clarification in order that there could be no misunderstanding that the resolution was intended as one which would lead to an armistice and the cessation of hostilities in Korea. In his somewhat vague manner, he suggested in addition that since both sides were dissatisfied with the conditions under which prisoners of war were held, it might be possible to have the situation of the prisoners of war camp investigated. We were aware that Menon had expressed the idea within the last few days that some neutral group might be asked to investigate the conditions in prisoners of war camps on both sides and we were relieved that Menon's remarks on the question in plenary were no more specific than they were.

5. Gross speaking for the United States pledged the full support of his government as the government charged with responsibility for the Unified Command to make every effort to carry out the terms of resolution "loyally and completely". He said that if unhappily the resolution did not lead to agreement and an armistice in Korea it would at least have the advantage of setting the record straight and revealing whether the Communists did or did not really desire to reach an armistice agreement in Korea. He asserted that the United Nations spoke to the Chinese and North Korean people through this resolution and he expressed the hope that they would join with the United Nations in an effort to reach an honourable and lasting peace.

Following from the Under-Secretary, Begins: I think the adoption by the Assembly of the Indian resolution is a heartening example of the value of the United Nations as a catalyst of opinion in the free world. It may be true that we are no closer to an armistice in Korea, but at least the Communists have been completely isolated. The degree of unity shown by the non-Communist world is far beyond what any serious observer would have expected in mid-October when the Assembly opened. More specifically, the fact that the United States and India have supported the same resolution is encouraging for the future. Mr. Pearson as President of the Assembly has, of course, played a central role and the Canadian Delegation has had a very prominent part to play. Our warmest congratulations on the results achieved. Repeated to New York as No. 223 of December 6th.

Following from the Minister, Begins: Please request our High Commissioner in New Delhi to transmit the following message from me to Mr. Nehru, Begins:

I have received through our High Commissioner your reply to my message of December 3 and I am deeply grateful to you for the consideration which you have given to this question. In the light of the views which you have expressed concerning the best tactical approach to Peking, I have decided to transmit the text of the resolution and a brief message directly by telegram to Chou En-Lai and also to the Foreign Minister of the People's Democratic Republic of Korea. These communications were sent forward late last evening but it is not intended to release the text of the covering message until time has elapsed to permit its receipt in Peking. The text of my message therefore will probably be released by the United Nations Secretariat in the course of today (December 6). An advance copy was sent to Madame Pandit late last evening. Any subsequent steps you can take in Peking through your Ambassador to follow up this matter will, I am sure, be most helpful and will be of the greatest possible assistance to us all. Regards.

2. Text of my message to Chou En-Lai is as follows, Begins:

The General Assembly of the United Nations, at its 399th plenary meeting on December 3, 1952, adopted a resolution under item 16(a) of its agenda — Korea: Reports of the United Nations Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea. Under the terms of that resolution, originally sponsored by the Government of India, the President of the General Assembly is requested "to communicate the following proposals to the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China and to the North Korean authorities as forming a just and reasonable basis for an agreement so that an immediate cease-fire would result and be effected; to invite their acceptance of these proposals and to make a report to the General Assembly during its present session and as soon as appropriate." In discharge of the duty placed upon me by the terms of that resolution, I have the honour to transmit to you the text of the resolution and to invite your acceptance of the proposals contained therein.

(2) I send this message to you against the background of the casualties, the sufferings, and the destruction in Korea which are the inevitable consequences of war, and I add my personal appeal that you should give it your most thoughtful and sympathetic consideration. When the First Committee of the General Assembly, by an unanimous decision, agreed to treat the Korean question as a matter of urgency, its decision reflected the concern of all members of the United Nations, a concern which I am sure is shared by the peoples of the world, over the tragedy of war and devastation in Korea, and their deep desire to bring this war to an end on terms acceptable to both sides. To this end negotiations have been proceeding for some sixteen months at Panmunjom, in the course of which a wide measure of agreement on the terms of an armistice has been reached. The sole remaining issue which has not been settled in the course of these armistice negotiations concerns the principles and procedures by which the repatriation of prisoners of war can be effected.

(3) In itself, the prisoners of war issue is a challenge to the fundamental humanitarian instincts which are shared by all mankind and urgently calls for solution. In camps on both sides, human beings have been kept for long months under military detention while the lengthy negotiations concerning their fate have been continuing. There is an inescapable moral obligation on both sides in the Korean conflict to make every possible effort to ensure that these prisoners of war shall be free to return to their homelands, and their speedy return facilitated.

(4) The discussion of this matter in the First Committee of this Assembly has made clear the general agreement in the United Nations that this problem should be dealt with and the repatriation of prisoners of war should be effected under the terms of the Geneva Convention relative to the treatment of prisoners of war of August 12, 1949, under the well-established principles and practice of International Law, and under the relevant provisions of the draft armistice agreement. It was also generally agreed that prisoners of war should be released from the custody of the detaining powers to a repatriation commission so that they can be free to exercise their undoubted right with respect to repatriation, and that it was inconsistent with common humanitarian principles that a detaining power should offer any hindrance to the return to their homelands of any prisoners of war. Finally, there was general agreement that the Geneva convention cannot be construed as authorizing a detaining power to employ force to effect the return of individual prisoners of war to their homelands.

(5) The General Assembly resolution clearly states the above principles with respect to the solution of the prisoner of war issue, and, in addition, makes concrete proposals with regard to the machinery of repatriation. It represents ideas put forward by many governments represented in the General Assembly whose unanimous desire is to bring peace to Korea. The resolution can make this desire effective because its acceptance will make it possible to achieve an armistice and a complete and immediate cessation of hostilities.

(6) The resolution, in addition, makes reference to the desire of the General Assembly to expedite and facilitate, once an armistice is effective, the convening of a political conference provided for in Article 60 of the draft armistice agreement already accepted by the military negotiators at Panmunjom.

(7) It is my earnest hope that the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China will accept these proposals of the General Assembly as a basis for the solution of the one remaining issue which has prevented the conclusion of an armistice during the negotiations at Panmunjom. Once this issue is solved, it will become possible to bring the fighting to an end and complete the programme for a peaceful settlement in Korea leading, we must hope, towards a more general settlement which would contribute to peace in Asia and in the world.

(8) The United Nations is determined to do everything possible to bring the fighting to an end in Korea. This is also the declared aim of the Central People's Government. This common aim can be achieved if the proposals which are now submitted for your consideration are, as I earnestly hope will be the case, accepted in the spirit in which they are put forward. In this hope, as President of the Seventh Session of the General Assembly of the United Nations, I appeal to you to accept these proposals of the United Nations as forming a just and reasonable basis for an agreement which will serve to bring about a constructive and durable peace in Korea.

(9) I shall look forward to receiving as soon as possible your reply to this communication, which I shall report to the General Assembly when it is received.

(10) In accordance with the decision of the General Assembly, the text of the resolution has also been communicated to the North Korean authorities, to whom I am sending a similar message.

(11) Please accept, Sir, the assurance of my highest consideration. Ends.

3. Text of resolution follows. Ends. Message ends.

Following for Minister.

Pillai, Secretary General of External Affairs Ministry gave me the following information this afternoon.

2. Immediately after receiving your message on November [December?] 7th the Prime Minister instructed the Indian Ambassador in Peking that in speaking to the Chinese Government about Assembly resolution he was not, repeat not, to be apologetic about Indian role at Assembly; he was to be firm but not, repeat not, show resentment at language used by Peking.

3. The Indians have not, repeat not, yet received any indication of nature of reply Chinese will make to your message. Pillai thinks they are probably consulting their friends in Moscow but he takes some encouragement from the fact that there has not been an immediate rejection. He thinks the Chinese will probably not, repeat not, make their position clear until Eisenhower's policy is clearer.

4. Pillai, while disclaiming that he attaches much importance to story, has twice given me at length the following information which if true would indicate that Chinese are partners not, repeat not, puppets of Russians. The Swedish Minister in Peking recently informed the Indian Ambassador that he had heard from French source that Chou En-lai, on his recent visit to Moscow, had informed Stalin that China would not, repeat not, make peace in Korea except on his own terms since China found the continuation of the war useful for three reasons: her ability to hold United Nations forces increased her prestige; the war helped to create unity at home; the fighting provided useful training for the Chinese army. The same source has said that the Chinese have requested the Russians to remain at Port Arthur presumably because this would discourage the United Nations from extending the war.

5. Pillai expressed personal displeasure at Menon's speech in the United States on Chinese recognition which serves no, repeat no, useful purpose but merely annoyed the Americans.

6. He pressed me for my personal views on a story which he had received that a group in the Pentagon did not, repeat not, want an armistice in Korea at the present time. I said that I found it hard to believe that such a group could represent more than a minority point of view because of powerful strategic and political arguments in favour of an armistice, e.g. that war diverts strength from Europe and puts a political strain on the North Atlantic Alliance. I put this point as strong as I could since it is, I think, obvious that the Prime Minister is skeptical about the professed desire of United States for an armistice.

7. There must be some sort of re-examination of Indian foreign policy taking place here as a result of recent events. Obviously the more that can be done to lessen fear about foreign policy of new administration in Washington the more likely the re-examination will lead in the direction we want.

KOREA — RECENT DEVELOPMENTS

2. On December 14, Chou En-Lai, Foreign Minister of the Peking Government, replied by cable to Mr. Pearson's message, and this reply was made public on December 15. The Chinese reply rejected the Assembly's resolution as being "illegal and void", and charged that it supported "the United States Government's position of forcibly retaining in captivity prisoners of war in contravention of international conventions". Other portions of this lengthy and violent message reiterated the familiar Communist position on the Geneva Convention, and contained equally familiar assertions regarding terrorism by United States forces in Korea. The reply concluded by asking the Assembly to rescind its resolution and to call upon the United States Government "to resume immediately the negotiations at Panmunjom" on the basis of the Draft Armistice Agreement. #### THE DELEGATION'S ASSESSMENT OF THE UNITED NATIONS ASSEMBLY

Telegrams from Paris Nos. 252 of December 21<sup>1</sup> and 272 of December 29<sup>1</sup> appear to me to indicate that a natural feeling of irritation against the Asian and other under-developed countries may be clouding the judgment of the Delegation on tactics and strategy. The irritation may also be making it difficult for our Delegation to understand the Asian approach to problems before the Assembly. The Asians seem to be judged by one standard and we by another.

2. Thus the reason we support certain resolutions which are otherwise futile is that they are good propaganda in the Western world. When the poor countries insist on passing a resolution about an international development fund we say that it is futile and will debase the currency of United Nations resolutions and machinery, but we do not accept the fact that from their point of view it is good propaganda in the under-developed world.<sup>2</sup>

3. When we refuse to accept compromise proposals, we are opposing wishful thinking which assumes that a clever form of words can eliminate vital differences of principle. When the poor countries refuse to water down their resolutions they are being intransigent and unrealistic and irresponsible. Presumably, however, they could retort that what we are asking them to do is to assume that a clever form of words can eliminate vital differences of

There is a difference of course in the nature of the publicity. L.B. P[earson] principle between poor and rich countries on how much assistance rich countries should give to poor.

4. A good deal is made of the so-called irresponsibility of the poor countries. I assume that an irresponsible delegation is one which supports policies which are not in the interests of that delegation's country. Perhaps, however, the pressure that the poor countries are putting on the rich countries in the debates over Morocco, Southwest Africa, economic development, human rights is, on the whole, serving the interests of the poor countries. While this pressure is annoying to the West, if it is kept up, it is probably going to make it increasingly difficult for the West to refuse to increase the pace of the granting of self-government and to increase the pace and extent of the economic aid which it grants.

5. Paragraph 8 of telegram No. 252 contrasts the Western propaganda resolutions on disarmament, Germany, Yugoslavia and Italy with impractical and ideologically confusing compromises put forward by the poor countries. The impression conveyed is that the Assembly had to choose between these two types of resolution. I suggest that on some at least of the resolutions a half-way house might have been possible. Thus in the disarmament resolution we were, from the beginning, of the opinion that it was unwise to ask the Assembly once again to affirm support of the majority plan on atomic energy. The Americans were intransigent on this. There may have been other amendments which could have made it more palatable to the Asian and Latin American Delegations. The same may have been true of the other three Western propaganda resolutions. The feeling I get from this distance is that insufficient efforts have been made by the principal Western Delegations in Paris to try to reach agreement with the Asian Delegations on compromises which would not diminish greatly the propaganda value of the resolutions in Western countries and might increase their propaganda value in other countries.

6. The suggestion that the United Nations might adopt a "coming into court with clean hands" doctrine is disturbing. The short answer is that the Assembly is not a sort of court but a sort of parliament. Another answer is that the clean hands doctrine is applicable only to certain types of cases before courts. If an assault or theft is committed, the criminal is prosecuted even if the person who has been assaulted or whose belongings have been stolen does not have clean hands.

7. The basic objection, however, to the doctrine is that its adoption would mean that the Assembly would be turned into a Quaker meeting in which no one would be moved by the spirit to speak since no country comes to the Assembly with clean hands. There are relative degrees of dirt.

8. In one place at least the telegram indicates that the author has accepted at face value public statements which the Canadian Delegation has made even though it is clear that these public statements are misleading. It is said in paragraph 21 that "of course the highly industrialized countries cannot under present circumstances increase expenditures for foreign assistance." It is not a matter of cannot but will not. There is no economic bar to Canada, for example, increasing its Colombo assistance from $25 million to $100 million a year. We could do so either by reducing our defence expenditures by $75 million or by reducing the investment boom in Canada by $75 million or by cutting down civilian consumption in Canada or by borrowing from the United States or by a combination of all five methods.

9. Telegram 252 seems to oversimplify dangerously the difficult problems created by the rise of Islamic nationalism in areas which are of strategic importance to the Western world. It seems to assume that the aspirations of Islamic nationalism can be satisfied only at the expense of the defence requirements of the Western world. This is too simple a view. There may be cases where the defence requirements of the Western world require us to satisfy Islamic nationalism at the expense of a metropolitan power. We have, for example, to weigh the possibility that a continuation of present French policy in Morocco might provoke so much disorder there as to constitute a greater strategic danger to us than a grant of self-government to Morocco.

10. Moreover, to look at the wider picture, it is impossible for the Western world to prevent the Islamic world from falling under Communist domination if we permit the Communists to capture the various Islamic nationalist movements. We must, therefore, not allow these movements to conclude that we are their enemies and the Communists are their friends. This is of the utmost importance to us for purely realistic strategic reasons. Thus when we consider what is "a realistic if inglorious" policy in Morocco or Southwest Africa we must realize that strong strategic arguments can be brought forward in favour either of supporting the French and the South Africans or of supporting the Arabs and the coloured people. Indeed, on purely realistic if inglorious considerations, it may be in the interests of the West to throw to the wolves the two million white people in South Africa if it should become clear that our continued support of them would increase greatly the danger of the Communists getting the support of the billion or so coloured people in the world. I am not suggesting that our policy on Southwest Africa should be based on such purely "realistic" considerations. I do suggest, however, that those who call themselves realists about South Africa may be sentimentalists.

11. Similarly, I suggest that the policy of the Western countries on Morocco at this Assembly was contrary to our own interests and was unrealistic and sentimental.<sup>3</sup>

Paris, January 23, 1952

Dear Escott:

I have your letter of January 11+ enclosing the memorandum which you prepared after surviving the shock of receiving our telegrams Nos. 252 of December 21 and 272 of December 29.

Needless to say, I have read your memorandum with much interest. Perhaps it would be better if I postponed comment on most of the points raised in it until we have an opportunity of discussing them at length in Ottawa.

I would, however, like to comment on the first paragraph of your memorandum which suggests that a feeling of irritation against the Asian and other under-developed territories may be clouding the judgment of the delegation on tactics and strategy. Perhaps I am wrong, but I have interpreted this paragraph to mean that the delegation has failed in some way to give effect to the principle set out in the following paragraph.

Each member of the delegation is, I think, very conscious of the importance of the passage in the commentary referred to in Mr. Pearson's telegram No. 206 of January 9,+ namely:

"If the differences between the West and the Asian States led by India should become more pronounced, the result could be extremely serious, especially in its effects on Western attempts to restrain the expansionism of the Soviet Union. Canadian effort at the Sixth Session of the General Assembly should therefore be directed toward helping to eliminate misunderstanding and, where possible, to bridge the gaps between the policies of the United States Government and those of the Asian Governments."

I have interpreted this passage widely to mean that not only should we try to bridge the gap between the policies of the United States and those of Asian countries, but that we should where possible endeavour to gain the sympathy and friendship of Middle East, Asian, and Latin American countries.

Each member of the delegation is also very conscious of the fact that we have been able to do very little at this Assembly to gain the good-will of Middle East, Asian and Latin American countries. We think, however, that the main reason for our failure is that, whereas our general instructions emphasize the importance of the bridging the gap principle, the instructions we have received on specific issues have prevented us from giving effect to this principle on most of the important questions that have come before the Assembly.

Let me review some of the issues to which most of the Middle East, Asian and Latin American countries have attached great importance in this Assembly:

(a) Economic Development of Under-Developed Countries

It is, I think, true to say that we were amongst those who took the lead in opposing the setting up of an International Development Authority to provide for the development of under-developed countries. The Chilean resolution on this subject had the vigorous support of nearly all Middle East, Asian and Latin American countries. When the Chilean resolution passed in Committee over our adverse vote, we voted and spoke against it in Plenary and we were ready to make representations in the capitals of those countries which had actively sponsored the resolution, if the United States took the lead in so doing. My impression is that our votes and speeches on this issue were in accordance with our instructions.

(b) Covenants on Political and Economic Rights

There is little doubt that the position of our delegation at this Assembly has been further removed from that of those delegations desiring covenants on political and economic rights than that of any other delegation except possibly the United Kingdom. On this issue, it might be said that the United States delegation tried to bridge the gap between Canadian and United Kingdom policy and that of Asian, Middle East, and Latin American countries. In a speech which Mrs. Marshall<sup>4</sup> made to the Third Committee throwing cold water on the whole idea of a covenant of economic rights, Mr. Heeney expressed concern because some kind words were said about a covenant restricted to the traditional political rights. Again, I understand that the position we took on this issue was in accordance with Cabinet instructions. If we departed from Cabinet instructions, it was probably, as Mr. Heeney suggests, in giving more sympathetic consideration to the position of Middle East, Asian and Latin American countries than was warranted.

(c) Morocco

We took the lead in having the consideration of this item postponed by the Assembly. The decision to sponsor the resolution postponing consideration of the discussion of Morocco was taken by the the Minister. The Middle Eastern and Asian countries particularly were vitally concerned in this issue. It was on this issue that Sir Zafrulla Khan, generally a good friend of the Western Democracies, paid humble tribute to the Soviet bloc delegations for the stand they had taken.

(d) Disarmament

In your memorandum you say "we were from the beginning of the opinion that it was unwise to ask the Assembly to affirm support of the majority plan on atomic energy." Although some uneasiness was expressed in the commentary about the ambiguousness of our stand in favour of the majority plan, neither the commentary nor, I believe, our instructions for the Committee of Twelve last summer went so far as to say it would be unwise to ask the Assembly to affirm support for the majority plan. Moreover, in discussions which I had with Mr. Pearson, I do not remember that he suggested it. To satisfy India and other abstainers on the three power resolution it would have, I think, been necessary not only to drop any reference to the majority plan (which we might have accepted) but to have confined the resolution to setting up a disarmament commission with no terms of reference except to consider all proposals put before it. I was not aware that this was the type of resolution favoured by the Department.

(e) South Africa

We perhaps had the worst of both worlds on this subject. Though we may have offended the South Africans, I do not think we won the good-will of the various countries which took the lead in criticizing South Africa's policy regarding South-West Africa and Indians in South Africa. Though we voted in favour of the "regretting" resolution, we abstained on nearly all other questions affecting South Africa and made no statements in Committee or Plenary.

(f) Trusteeship Questions

Although our general instructions on trusteeship encouraged us to attempt to reconcile the administering authorities and their critics, the guidance we had on specific questions usually forced us to take a position on the side of the administering powers. Moreover, we were under instructions from the Minister not to take a prominent part in the Fourth Committee. We were thus rarely in a position to bridge the gap between administering and non-administering powers.

(g) Wheat

A few days ago some members of the delegation thought that they might be able to give some support to an Indian amendment to a food and famine resolution which requested the grain exporting countries to play a special role in the study which FAO is going to carry out on the question of the food reserves. Our instructions were, however, to abstain if the Indian amendment had been put to a vote. Although the Indian delegate withdrew his amendment under strong pressure, it was clear that he blamed the Canadian delegation for the pressure brought to bear upon him. He, in fact, expressed his resentment to us.

I do not complain about the instructions we received on any particular issue but I do suggest that when our specific instructions make it difficult for us to carry out our general instructions, consideration might be given to changing either the general instructions or the instructions on specific issues. As a result of my experience at this Assembly, I cannot help thinking that there should be a franker recognition in our general instructions that in reaching a decision on a specific question the following principles carry great weight:

(a) We consider that when a matter adversely affects our self-interest we vote in accordance with our self-interest without much regard for the effect that our vote will have on other delegations. This principle would, I think, explain our position on questions such as the International Development Authority, Human Rights, Wheat, and Newsprint.

(b) We were not prepared, except under considerable provocation, to offend or embarrass our friends even though we think that some action they have taken is wrong or unwise. This would, I think, explain our stand on Morocco, the United States Mutual Security Act, and perhaps also South Africa. A special word is in order about South Africa. No doubt our stand on South African questions has displeased and probably offended the South African Government, although their delegation here have taken it in good part. Let us review some of the decisions. We voted for the "regretting" resolution, but only after it had, at our request, been watered down to a very mild resolution. We abstained on the question of invitations to the Herero Chiefs<sup>5</sup> and to Michael Scott. We also abstained on a mild resolution regarding the position of Indians in South Africa. When the South Africans threatened to introduce a resolution in Plenary declaring illegal the action of the Fourth Committee in inviting witnesses to appear before it, we told the South Africans that we would abstain on this resolution even though we thought the action of the Fourth Committee was legal. Hence, if the stand we took on South Africa implied censure, it was only mild censure. It seems true to say that we have been long suffering and patient, and the stand that we took at this Session was mainly due to South African intransigence.

(c) Solidarity with Western Democracies. On nearly all important issues where the policies of the United States, United Kingdom and France clashed with those of the Soviet Union, we took our stand with the Western Democracies. We did so, of course, not only for reasons of solidarity but because our own interests and convictions coincided very largely with those of the Western Democracies. Nevertheless, I cannot think of a single vote of any importance between East and West on which we opposed the United States, United Kingdom and France combined. Most of our abstentions were on issues where the United States, United Kingdom, and France were themselves divided.

(d) Bridging the gap. It was only when the principles outlined in paragraphs (a), (b), and (c) did not come into play that we were able to apply the bridging the gap principle. This was done, for example, in discussions about the Palestine Conciliation Commission. On one or two other occasions where we might have done more than we did, we did not act because we had no time to ask for instructions and were, in view of the Minister's instructions to us here, reluctant to take a lead without specific authority from the Department.

Perhaps I should say a special word about India. In this Assembly it would have been difficult to bridge the gap between Indian and United States policies. Except on a few issues in which it has a special interest (for example, development of under-developed countries, South-West Africa, Indians in South Africa) the Indian delegation has abstained where the policies of the Soviet Union and the United States have differed (i.e. disarmament, Collective Measures Committee Report, German Elections Commission) and did not indicate what they considered the right policy to be. They merely said that India would abstain until the Great Powers could agree among themselves. As a rule Indonesia, Afghanistan, and Burma followed the Indian lead. In these cases where India had no positive policy of its own it would have been difficult to bridge the gap between Indian and United States policies except by bringing pressure on the United States to make concessions to meet the Soviet view.

I freely confess that I have been irritated by the attitude of some under-developed countries and particularly Latin American ones. I am irritated with Chile and Peru at this moment. The representatives of these two countries have taken a most self-righteous line in this Assembly and yet when they were invited to appear before the Negotiating Committee to state what contributions they might make to the expanded technical assistance programme, neither country took the trouble to appear or to send a word of excuse. (Last year neither country made any contribution to the programme. That is perhaps the reason why they did not come.) I am, however, not conscious that a feeling of irritation has influenced my judgment on any specific question.

I am looking forward to seeing you in Ottawa. May I express the hope that the members of the Department will not start sharpening their knives at least until I arrive.

Yours sincerely,

DAVID M. JOHNSON

SECRET AND PERSONAL

New Delhi, January 24, 1952

Dear Escott,

I have your letter of January 11th† with its enclosure which says most acutely a number of things that I have wanted to have said. I might add a few comments as follows:

Propaganda

I cannot see much future for an international organization if propaganda and tactics take charge. The best propaganda, if one must speak in such terms, comes by indirection, from dealing and seeming to deal with problems on their merits. In my experience abroad I have been much struck by the reputation that Canada has attained because, on the whole, we are regarded as good world citizens trying so to act. International confidence can only be built up if, by and large, such conduct comes generally to be expected. The trouble now is that the world is becoming so shrewd in recognizing propaganda and tactics for what they are that it may come to suspect them when they are not present. Such a result would be a crowning disaster and would, more than anything else, "debase the currency of United Nations resolutions and machinery."

Even if, on occasion, (compare, for instance, your paragraph 9) some outstanding practical reason might prevent us from concurring with any course that would otherwise seem more in accord with the spirit of the times, an honest statement of our reasons might be better than evasion, and would, at least, be understood. I recall an account by Lord Irwin, as he then was, of a conversation with Gandhi who had come to ask him why the police had not been severely disciplined because of their conduct on a certain occasion. Irwin replied that, as Gandhi knew, there was about to be some great meeting that the police would have to superintend. He could not afford, he said, to let his police go there with their tails between their legs. Gandhi said that he quite understood the practical force of such an answer and retired without any further argument. In spite of appearances there is a large amount of this practical sense in the East.

This may be à propos the Canadian stand on the Santa Cruz idea. We could not be sure here that we had the correct text of the proposal which went through various transformations, but it seemed to be always subject to the hoped-for reduction in defence budgets; if so, whatever else might be said of it, it would not seem to have been answered by a statement that "the highly industrialized countries cannot under present circumstances increase expenditures for foreign assistance." Even under "present circumstances", as you point out, the word "cannot" was hardly accurate. Besides the illustrations you give, rearmament does not seem to deter us from promising $18,000,000 to television and did not deter us from giving $60,000,000 to Canadian farmers. I should have thought that we could have made a much less categorical answer, explaining at the same time that however much it might be willing to join in helpful measures when the circumstances permitted, no country could give a perpetual blanket mortgage for the future.

I agree thoroughly on "intransigence". I am becoming very sick of the word. I once defined a bore as one who prevents me from being a bore. Somewhat similarly, "intransigence" seems to mean anything that runs counter to my own intransigence. Usually, the word is applied when the other fellow wishes to follow his policy rather than mine, or, when I try to fob him off with a short-cut, insists on reminding me of a principle. If there were an international A.B.C. of words not to be used, at least for some time, I would put "intransigence" among them.

In some respects it may seem that the poorer nations are demanding a new sort of colonialism, and their expectations are, at times, somewhat extravagant; but after all, the hopes of these nations are founded in the Charter, and surely it is from the West that the doctrine came that the standards of living must be raised in backward countries. Even if we must think for the present in terms of a divided world it is in the interest of one half of that world that the new democracies now in being should be able to stand up economically, and that other backward countries should be able to grow in health.

I hope that in our general policies we are not going so to act as to crystallize the notion of an Islamic world. We have enough sectionalism as it is. It is noteworthy that the Arab and Asian powers that made representations yesterday on Tunisia were not exclusively Muslim. India, a determinedly secular state, was among them. The true policy, not only for the Commonwealth but for the world, is that stated by Sir Eyre Crowe years ago: the policy that fits the best interests of the greatest number of mankind. Our best propaganda and our best tactics will lie in pursuing the courses that seem to have that policy as their guide.

Yours sincerely,

WARWICK CHIPMAN

PERSONAL AND SECRET

Ottawa, February 6, 1952

Dear Dave,

Many thanks for your letter of January 23 commenting without any evidence of irritation on my irritating remark that some of the telegrams from the Delegation in Paris indicated that a natural feeling of irritation against the Asian and other under-developed countries at the Assembly might be clouding the judgment of the Delegation on tactics and strategy.

My memorandum has served a useful purpose by precipitating your letter. I agree with you that consideration should be given to changing either the general instructions to our Delegation to the Assembly or the instructions on specific issues, and I hope that in our post mortem on the last session of the Assembly we can go into this question fully both on the official level and then in discussions with the Minister.

I do hope that these post mortem discussions can be arranged to take place in Ottawa at a time to suit your convenience and the plans of the Minister.

In this post mortem I hope that we will re-examine in turn our policy on the seven points which you list on pages 2 to 4 of your letter.

No such re-examination will be of much practical value unless it is accompanied by some discussion of the relative degree of importance which we attach to maintaining at the General Assembly an outward show of solidarity with the United States, the United Kingdom and France. In your letter you state that you cannot think of a single vote of any importance between East and West on which we opposed the United States, the United Kingdom and France combined. I should like to know whether this statement of yours would be equally accurate if you omitted France. It also would be interesting to compare our position on these votes with that taken, say, by Norway or the Netherlands.

We might also discuss in the post mortem the merits of the general principle on voting which we have followed at this Assembly. This principle, as I understand it, is that when we are in fact opposed to a resolution moved by a friend, we demonstrate our opposition by abstention and that when we are in fact in favour of a resolution proposed by the Soviet group, we demonstrate our approval by abstention.

If you will look at my memorandum of January 11 again, I think you will see that my worries were not about the actual position which the Delegation had taken on any issue as about the kind of analysis of issues which was set forth in the two telegrams I referred to. My complaint was that in the analysis of issues before the Assembly the Asians seemed to be judged by one standard and the Western Powers by another. My other worry was that there was, it seemed to me, an over-simplification in the telegrams of the difficult problems created by the rise of Islamic nationalism in areas which are of strategic importance to the Western world.

I hope that you can, before your arrival in Ottawa, prepare a memorandum on the Assembly which would constitute the basis for our post mortem and a starting point for a reconsideration of policy on specific issues. It would be very useful if you could send this to us in Ottawa before you arrive here so that we can circulate it.

All your friends in the Department are looking forward with keen anticipation to seeing you again. It seems a very long time since we said good-bye in Karachi two years ago. You will also find the Department loud in their praises of the way in which you have carried out a most difficult task at this Assembly. The job of Chief of Staff of the Delegation to the Assembly is difficult enough at any time but at this Assembly it was much more difficult than usual. The reasons are obvious. The Minister was there for only part of the time. If the Assembly had been in New York it would have been easier to have got Ministerial decisions quickly. The Delegation this year contained fewer members with long experience. This session of the Assembly was confronted in a way in which no previous session has been by the second most crucial problem of our generation — the relations between the “have” world and the “have not” world.

All best wishes.

Yours sincerely,

ESCOTT REID

Following is the text of the revised draft resolution on Palestine given to our delegation by Campbell of the United Kingdom delegation this morning with a request that it should not be discussed at this juncture with any other delegation. Text begins:

The General Assembly

RECALLING its Resolution 194 (III) of 11 December, 1948 and 394 of 14 December, 1950,

HAVING EXAMINED the report of the United Nations Conciliation Commission for Palestine (A/ .....),

NOTING THAT agreement has not been reached between the parties on the final settlement of outstanding questions,

RECOGNIZING THAT in the interests of the peace and stability of the Near East efforts to achieve such a final settlement should be continued,

1. Urges the governments concerned to seek agreement with a view to an early settlement of their outstanding differences and for this purpose to make full use of United Nations facilities;

2. Expresses its appreciation to the Conciliation Commission for Palestine for its efforts to assist the parties to reach agreement on their outstanding differences;

3. Notes with regret that, as stated in paragraph 87 of the report, the Commission has been unable to fulfil its mandate;

4. Considers nevertheless that, in the light of Paragraph 86 of the report, the Conciliation Commission for Palestine should continue to be available to the parties to assist them in reaching agreement on outstanding questions, (and that the office established under paragraph 2 of resolution 394 (V) of 14 December 1950 should continue to be maintained);

(5. Authorises the Conciliation Commission for Palestine to designate in its discretion and after consultation with the Secretary-General a representative or representatives to assist the parties in reaching agreement on outstanding questions when in the opinion of the commission circumstances warrant);

6. Decides that the headquarters of the Conciliation Commission for Palestine should be transferred to the headquarters of the United Nations;

7. Requests the Conciliation Commission for Palestine to report to the seventh regular session of the General Assembly on the progress of efforts to achieve a peaceful settlement of outstanding questions;

8. Requests the Secretary-General to provide the necessary staff and facilities for carrying out the terms of the present resolution. Text ends.

Reference: My telegram No. 241 of December 19th, 1951.

1. At a meeting of Commonwealth representatives at headquarters of the United Kingdom delegation this morning Coulson<sup>6</sup> distributed a redraft of the proposed resolution on the Palestine Conciliation Commission. Four points are worthy of note in the new draft.

(a) In the preamble an additional paragraph has been added in the following terms:

“Considering that the governments concerned have the primary responsibility for reaching a settlement of their outstanding differences. . .”

(b) Paragraph 5 has been re-written to read as follows:

“Authorizes the Conciliation Commission for Palestine in its discretion to designate a representative or representatives to assist it in carrying out its functions.”

J.E. Coulson, Minister Plenipotentiary, Permanent Delegation of United Kingdom to the United Nations; Alternate Representative of the Sixth Session of the General Assembly.

(c) Paragraph 6 is revised so as to read:

“Decides that the headquarters of the Conciliation Commission for Palestine should be transferred to the headquarters of the United Nations, a representative of the commission being maintained at Jerusalem.”

(d) Finally the Conciliation Commission is asked to render progress reports “periodically to the Secretary General for transmission to the members of the United Nations” instead of reporting to the 7th regular session of the General Assembly, as the former draft proposed.

2. Coulson informed us that although there was general support for this resolution it had been difficult to find sponsors for it among countries not directly concerned with the Palestine problem. It would therefore be sponsored jointly by the United States, United Kingdom, France and Turkey. Sharett (Israel)<sup>7</sup> had criticized the draft only mildly and was prepared to go along with it. The Arabs would not object.

Ottawa, January 7, 1952

CONFIDENTIAL. IMPORTANT.

PALESTINE CONCILIATION COMMISSION

Reference: Your telegrams No. 281, January 3,† and No. 289, January 4.

We have now had an opportunity to examine the Conciliation Commission's Report and to read its conclusions in conjunction with the draft United States Resolution contained in your telegram No. 241 of December 19 and with the points in the redraft contained in your telegram No. 289 of January 4. Until the draft text of the Resolution has been made available to the French and Turkish Delegations and their reactions obtained to its principal recommendation — the move to New York — the fate of the Resolution as a whole must remain uncertain. In other respects it should, however, prove acceptable to them as it seems to reflect the principal conclusions of the Commission's Report, albeit in less forthright language.

2. The one exception is the failure of the original United States draft to refer specifically to the refugee problem or to the functions of the Refugee Office established by the Commission last year. As we have always considered a settlement of the refugee problem as an essential first step towards a wider peace settlement, we suggest, unless you have strong views to the contrary, that you support the inclusion of an amendment to paragraph 4 such as that suggested by the United Kingdom or even one reaffirming more vigorously the continued existence and important responsibilities of its Refugee Office. With reference to UNRWAPR, see my immediately following telegram No. 198.†

3. As regards the draft paragraph 5, we agree with the United Kingdom view that the Commission already has the necessary authority to appoint an individual mediator when circumstances seem to warrant such action, but can see no harm in reaffirming the power to make use of a method of conciliation which has proven valuable in the past.

4. We are unable with the information now at our disposal to see the utility of "a representative of the Commission being maintained at Jerusalem" as suggested in the revised version of paragraph 6 but would like to have your views.

5. Otherwise, subject to your own views, we would have no objection to your co-sponsoring a resolution along the lines of the U.S. draft if you are asked to do so by the United Kingdom and the United States (preferably with the amendments referred to in paragraphs 2 and 3 above), especially as it now appears that Israel and the Arab States are willing to go along with the proposal and that there is general support for the resolution amongst other delegations. With reference to the changes noted in your telegram No. 289 of January 4, although as you know we have never been enthusiastic about including a provision along the lines of Item (a) in the Preamble we would seriously question only (c). This, however, we will leave to your discretion.

PALESTINE CONCILIATION COMMISSION

Reference: Your telegram No. 197 of January 7.

1. As you know the question of sponsorship of the draft resolution on the Palestine Conciliation Commission was settled before we received your telegram under reference, which authorized us to include Canada's name among the sponsors. France, Turkey, United Kingdom and United States sponsored.

2. It seemed to us in following the course of the debate that a good part of the controversy centered around non-essential features of the four-power draft resolution. In view of your willingness to have Canada associated with the effort to secure acceptance of the draft resolution, we discussed the developing situation with the United States and United Kingdom delegations and found that they agree with us that a few amendments to their draft resolution would probably make it much more acceptable to the ad hoc Political Committee. Since they were not in a position to offer to the committee themselves the rephrasing of their own draft, we undertook to suggest the necessary changes during the course of our own statement which was scheduled for the following day, January 11. The text of the amendment proposed will be found in my next succeeding telegram. My own covering statement has gone forward to you by bag.†

3. What seemed to all of us to be chiefly needed was to simplify the preamble and to delete certain phrases in the operative part of the draft resolution to which either Arabs or Israelis particularly objected. Operative paragraphs 3 and 4 of the amended draft, read together, provide the basis for future efforts to reach a settlement and make it possible to drop the very contentious first paragraph of the operative part of the four-power draft resolution. We thought, furthermore, that the proposed simplification of the draft would bring into stronger relief its two chief purposes, namely that of meeting the continuing need for conciliation on the basis of Assembly resolutions and that of securing the transfer of the headquarters of the commission to New York. Since the Conciliation Commission has always enjoyed authority to appoint subsidiary bodies or to employ technical experts, we proposed that paragraph 5 of the four-power draft should be dropped. In view of differences of opinion among the four powers about retaining a representative of the commission in Jerusalem, regarding which you had expressed misgivings, we offered a formula, now thought preferable by the four powers, which advocated the transfer of the commission's headquarters to New York "without prejudice to the maintenance of a representative in Jerusalem." The commission would in any case have the right to appoint a representative in Jerusalem if it so wished, but special reference is made to this possibility in the draft resolution because otherwise it might be difficult to get from the governments which control Jerusalem permission for the re-entry of a representative of the commission once the commission itself had left.

4. In the original draft resolution there was a reference to paragraph 86 of the Conciliation Commission's report, which deals with detailed proposals rejected by the parties during their Paris discussions last October. It would make the draft resolution more acceptable to both parties to have the reference to paragraph 86 deleted. It seemed to us that the resolution as a whole would be strengthened if a reference were made instead in this paragraph to past resolutions of the General Assembly on the basis of which the commission is to operate.

5. In view of our instructions we also prepared an amendment specifying that the Conciliation Commission's Refugee Office should be kept in operation. At the last moment, however, we dropped it in view of objections raised by the four powers. Coulson (United Kingdom) had already assured the ad hoc Political Committee that there was no question of closing the Refugee Office. It will be kept in operation as part of the Conciliation Commission's normal work. Jessup told us that if a reference to the Refugee Office were included in the draft resolution it would give rise to demands that all other aspects of the Conciliation Commission's work should also be specified. This in turn would lead to bitter debate and might prejudice the chances of adoption of the draft resolution.

6. Just before I spoke, Bokhari (Pakistan)<sup>8</sup> submitted a revised draft resolution which was worked out, I understand, in conference between representatives of Arab states and Pakistan. The text goes to you today in a separate telegram. The Pakistan draft resolution spells out the functions of the commission, particularly in relation to the settlement of the refugee problem. It instructs the commission to "implement" General Assembly resolutions, empowers the Refugee Office to act as the custodian of refugee property and provides that the Conciliation Commission shall be composed of seven members whose headquarters would remain in Jerusalem.

7. Jessup spoke on behalf of the four powers in committee on January 12 announcing their acceptance of the Canadian amendments. He told us privately that Israel will not oppose the amended joint draft resolution when it comes to a vote. However, to make it clear to the committee that the draft resolution represents a compromise between the Arab-Pakistani point of view and that of Israel, Eban<sup>9</sup> circulated today an Israeli draft resolution for which he prepared the way in his first speech. It proposes the abolition of the Conciliation Commission and the appointment of a good offices committee for the calendar year 1952. He will withdraw this resolution before the vote.

8. The Arabs have told Jessup that they will accept the amended joint draft resolution if three further amendments are incorporated in it:

(a) In operative paragraph 3 after "considers that," they would insert the words "in accordance with past resolutions of the General Assembly."

(b) In operative paragraph 4, after the word "continue", they would insert the words "its efforts to assist in the implementation of the previous resolutions of the General Assembly on Palestine and that the commission should continue.....". The words "in accordance with past resolutions of the General Assembly" which appear further down in paragraph 4 could then be deleted.

(c) The commission should be composed of five instead of three members.

9. The four powers will accept (a) and (b), but not, repeat not, (c). Hitherto all decisions of the commission have been unanimous. They think there is little likelihood of unanimous decisions in the future if representatives of Israel and the Arab bloc are added to the commission, as has been suggested, or even if close friends of Israel and the Arabs were appointed.

Professor Ahmed S. Bokhari, Permanent Representative of Pakistan to the United Nations; Representative to the Sixth Session of the General Assembly.

Abba Eban, Permanent Representative of Israel to the United Nations; Chairman, Delegation to the Sixth Session of the General Assembly.

10. We agree with the four powers that conciliation processes would be obstructed rather than expedited by the appointment of two interested states, and it seems to us that even the appointment of two neutral states would slow up its work appreciably, since this would involve the consulting of two additional governments at every stage. In view of the success of the Rhodes precedent,<sup>10</sup> the trend is likely to be towards reduction of the commission to a single mediator if developments in the Middle East should warrant the holding of anything in the nature of a conference to reach a final settlement.

11. The United Kingdom and United States delegations have been most appreciative of the help we have given toward securing majority support for the draft resolution, and Jessup when announcing acceptance of our amendments by the four sponsors made a number of kind references to the Canadian initiative.

An arrangement for negotiations towards a peace settlement under the supervision of a single United Nations mediator.

(b) By inserting the phrase "in accordance with past resolutions of the General Assembly" (set off by commas before and after the phrase) immediately after the word "parties" in line 3 of the paragraph.

6. Omit paragraph 5.

7. Amend paragraph 6 to read:

"Decides that without prejudice to the maintenance of a representative in Jerusalem, the headquarters of the Conciliation Commission for Palestine should be transferred to the headquarters of the United Nations:"

The draft resolution as amended would then read as follows:

"THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY,

"RECALLING its resolutions 194 (III) of 11 December 1948 and 394 (V) of 14 December 1950,

"HAVING EXAMINED the progress report of the United Nations Conciliation Commission for Palestine (A/1985),

"1. EXPRESSES its appreciation to the Conciliation Commission for Palestine for its efforts to assist the parties to reach agreement on their outstanding differences;

"2. NOTES with regret that, as stated in paragraph 87 of the report, the commission has been unable to fulfil its mandate;

"3. CONSIDERS that the governments concerned have the primary responsibility for reaching a settlement of their outstanding differences;

"4. CONSIDERS nevertheless that the Conciliation Commission for Palestine should continue to be available to the parties, in accordance with past resolutions of the General Assembly, to assist them in reaching agreement on outstanding questions;

"5. DECIDES that without prejudice to the maintenance of a representative in Jerusalem, the headquarters of the Conciliation Commission for Palestine should be transferred to the headquarters of the United Nations;

"6. REQUESTS the Conciliation Commission for Palestine to render progress reports periodically to the Secretary-General for transmission to the members of the United Nations;

"7. REQUESTS the Secretary-General to provide the necessary staff and facilities for carrying out the terms of the present resolution."

PALESTINE CONCILIATION COMMISSION

Reference: Our telegram No. 371 of 12 January, 1952.

1. When the Ad Hoc Political Committee adjourned for the week-end on 12th January it seemed likely that, with a few further amendments, the Arabs and their friends would support the 4-power draft resolution on the Palestine Conciliation Commission as amended by Canada and that Israel might abstain, though the Soviet bloc would oppose the amended draft resolution. In fulfilment of our expectations Afghanistan tabled two amendments early on Monday, 14th January, which represented, we thought, the minimum Arab demands for the further revision of the draft resolution. These were acceptable both to ourselves and to the four powers. They involved only the inclusion of two additional references to past resolutions of the General Assembly and a suggestion that the Conciliation Commission should "continue its efforts to secure the implementation of these resolutions."

2. Over the weekend, however, the Arabs and their friends seem to have made up their minds that if they exerted themselves once more they might be able to carry the committee still further. On Monday morning, accordingly, Colombia brought in a series of three revised amendments the purpose of which was

(a) To recall "all" previous Assembly resolutions on Palestine (we have been invoking only those resolutions which relate to the Conciliation Commission's work);

(b) To call on the governments to observe the Assembly resolutions "strictly" (no matter how out of date they may be) and to seek agreement for settling their differences "in a spirit of justice", (which the parties interpret each in their own way);

(c) To ask the Conciliation Commission "to ensure the strict observance" of the Assembly's resolutions (i.e., giving it a degree of executive authority not hitherto contemplated).

3. The Philippines also came forward on the 15th with an amendment in line with Arab wishes, expressing special regret that the refugees have not been repatriated or compensated for their properties. Indonesia and Iran revived Pakistan's proposal of January 11 that the headquarters of the commission should be kept in Jerusalem and asked that its membership be increased to seven.

4. The rapid introduction of these amendments just before the voting affected the atmosphere in the committee. It is true that the proposal to keep the commission's headquarters in Jerusalem was defeated (17-25-12, with Canada voting against), but the proposal to shift the headquarters to New York was also defeated on a tie vote (22-22-8, with Canada voting in favour). The chairman interpreted this to mean that the commission may continue its work in any place except Jerusalem or New York. (The Arabs had argued, however, that since the resolution made no reference to the location of the headquarters the commission could do as it pleased.)

5. The proposal to increase the membership of the commission to seven, although some of the Arabs and their friends themselves thought five would be enough, was carried by 24 to 22 with 11 abstentions, Canada voting against the proposal.

6. Colombia succeeded in having "all" resolutions of the Assembly invoked, despite the fact that some are out of date. It also succeeded in having the paragraph inserted which calls on the governments to observe these resolutions "strictly". The committee rejected, however, the third Colombian amendment, which called on the Conciliation Commission itself to ensure the strict observance of the resolutions.

7. The expression of special regret that the refugees have not yet been repatriated or compensated, suggested by the Philippines, was adopted by 28-13-16, Canada abstaining. Our abstention was based on two considerations. On the one hand our instructions have emphasized Canada's anxiety to have the refugee problem liquidated as soon as possible and to secure compensation of refugees for abandoned property. On the other hand, however, we do not believe large-scale repatriation is likely to be feasible. The authors of the joint draft resolution, moreover, have been trying to avoid spelling out any single function of the commission, since they do not think it wise to lay more emphasis on one part of the peace settlement than another.

8. The draft resolution as a whole as amended was adopted by 43-13 with 2 abstentions (Sweden and Turkey). Those voting against the draft resolution as a whole included the United States, the United Kingdom and France, the Soviet bloc, Israel and Uruguay. Supporters of the resolution included at least six European states, the great majority of the Latin American Republics and the Arab, Asian and African blocs. With a new adviser having to occupy the chair because of the absence of the usual member of the delegation on other business, and in the very confused situation prevailing, Canada supported the draft resolution as a whole as amended, in an unrecorded vote, but will vote against the draft resolution as amended in the plenary session.

9. The last-minute intervention of Colombia, the Philippines, Iran and Indonesia has had the effect of making it impossible for Israel to abstain, as we had hoped it would. Israel has reserved the right to bring forward in the plenary session again its proposal for a good offices committee.

10. The general effect of the revised draft resolution is to create an unwieldy group instructed to relate its work to a heterogeneous collection of Assembly resolutions some of which are mutually contradictory and some of which it is quite impossible to carry out. We suppose the commission will choose Geneva as its headquarters and would have no objection to this, but we do not believe the revised resolution will lead to an improvement of the situation unless the four states added to the commission are truly disinterested and the men chosen to represent them are unusually able. If we are approached with a request to allow Canada's name to be proposed for membership on the commission should we refuse, and if so on what grounds?

Following is the text of the resolution on the Palestine Conciliation Commission adopted by the ad hoc Political Committee on 15 January 1952.

THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY,

RECALLING all the resolutions adopted by previous sessions of the General Assembly on the Palestine problem,

HAVING EXAMINED the progress report of the United Nations Conciliation Commission for Palestine (A/1985),

1. EXPRESSES its appreciation to the Conciliation Commission for Palestine for its efforts to assist the parties to reach agreement on their outstanding differences;

2. NOTES with regret that, as stated in paragraph 87 of the report, the commission has been unable to fulfil its mandate and that the above-mentioned resolutions have not yet been implemented, in particular with regard to the repatriation of refugees wishing to return to their homes and also with regard to the just and equitable evaluation of and compensation for the properties of those not wishing to return;

3. CONSIDERS that the governments concerned have the primary responsibility for reaching a settlement of their outstanding differences in conformity with the resolutions of the General Assembly on Palestine;

4. URGES the governments concerned strictly to observe the resolutions of the General Assembly and to seek agreement with a view to an early settlement of their outstanding differences in a spirit of justice: and for this purpose to make full use of United Nations facilities;

5. CONSIDERS that the Conciliation Commission for Palestine should continue its efforts to secure the implementation of the resolutions of the General Assembly on Palestine, and accordingly to be available to the parties to assist them in reaching agreement on outstanding questions;

6. DECIDES that the Conciliation Commission shall consist of 7 members; the four additional members shall be designated by the General Assembly before the end of the present session;

7. REQUESTS the Conciliation Commission for Palestine to render progress reports periodically to the Secretary-General for transmission to the members of the United Nations;

8. REQUESTS the Secretary-General to provide the necessary staff and facilities for carrying out the terms of the present resolution.

ASSISTANCE TO PALESTINE REFUGEES

6. Some of the features of the Palestine Conciliation Commission resolution are not likely to be acceptable to a two-thirds majority of the Assembly. It seems to us that this gives us a reason for suggesting privately to the sponsors of the original Palestine Conciliation Commission draft resolution and to the Arab states that in the plenary meeting certain amendments might be offered to operative paragraphs 2 and 4 of the Palestine Conciliation Commission resolution in order to bring them into closer harmony with the language of the draft resolution on assistance to Palestine refugees. We have in mind also a possible compromise on operative paragraph 6 of the Palestine Conciliation Commission resolution, so as to provide for a commission of 5 instead of 7 members. It seems to us that the paragraphs in question could be so revised as to command general support and to avoid creating a situation which would force Arab delegates to recede from the cooperative attitude they have taken in recent discussions with the four powers.

7. Unless the situation should change we are not proposing to intervene in the debate, since it would serve no purpose except to explain our reserved position, and this can be done effectively and briefly on explanation of vote.

PALESTINE CONCILIATION COMMISSION

We are not entirely happy about the suggestion contained in your paragraph 8 that when the Resolution adopted in the Ad Hoc Political Committee on January 14 comes up in plenary session, the Canadian Delegation will reverse its stand and vote against. Instead, we consider that the Delegation should concentrate on inserting in the Resolution as it now stands, the minimum number of amendments which would make it acceptable to the original sponsoring powers and sufficiently palatable to ourselves and Israel to permit of abstention or an affirmative vote.

2. In view of the slim majority by which the more contentious paragraphs of the final draft were approved, there is every likelihood that they will not achieve the two-thirds majority required in plenary session. The present draft will therefore almost certainly undergo some amendment before its final adoption. We consider that the objective outlined in paragraph 1 above might be achieved if the following changes could be made in the present draft:

Operative Portion

Paragraph 2: Delete and substitute: "Notes with regret that the Commission has been unable to fulfil its mandate for the reasons set forth in paragraphs 84 and 85 of the Commission's Report."

Paragraph 4. Delete word "strictly".

Paragraph 5: Delete and substitute: "Considers that the Conciliation Commission for Palestine should continue its efforts to secure the implementation of Resolutions of the General Assembly relating to its work and to continue to be available to the parties to assist them in reaching agreement on outstanding questions."

Paragraph 6: Delete and substitute: "Decides that the Conciliation Commission shall consist of five members, the two additional members to be designated by the General Assembly before the end of the present Session." Had the vote in the Ad Hoc Political Committee not been taken sooner than expected, you would have received instructions from us to support the increase in the size of the Commission from three to five members, a change which seemed to us to be a harmless concession if it would suffice to win Arab support for the Resolution as it then stood. The Arabs might now be prepared to accept the compromise figure of five members and the original four sponsoring powers and Israel might also be persuaded to accept this change if the move to New York could be reinserted in a new draft.

Paragraph 7: Insert new paragraph reiterating the Canadian formula which was rejected in a tie vote in the Ad Hoc Political Committee concerning the transfer of the headquarters to New York. (This amendment is optional in the view of the Department, as we have never attached any great importance to the proposal. The Delegation should be guided on this point by the attitude of the original four sponsoring powers.)

3. The remaining paragraphs in the Resolution as adopted in Committee could remain unchanged.

4. If you should be asked about Canadian participation in an expanded Commission you should decline without explanation.

PALESTINE CONCILIATION COMMISSION

Reference: Your telegram No. 251 of January 15th [22nd].

1. The plenary meeting to discuss questions relating to Palestine is scheduled for January 26th.

2. We have been exploring for three days with the United States and United Kingdom delegations the possibility of securing agreed amendments to the resolution concerning the Palestine Conciliation Commission, in accordance with paragraph 6 of our telegram No. 421 of January 21st. We were glad to learn last evening from your telegram under reference that this is the approach the Department itself desires.

3. What we had done before receiving your telegram was to suggest informally that the following line of argument might be pursued:

(a) For purposes of orderly discussion, agenda item 24 was arbitrarily divided into two parts, although it was generally recognized that the question of a peace settlement and the question of the refugees are closely related.

(b) The committee adopted a resolution on the Conciliation Commission before its resolution on refugees was drafted. The latter resolution was the result of consultations between the four sponsoring powers and the Arab states and was satisfactory to both groups.

(c) It would be logical now to look back at the first resolution with a view to securing a similarly broad basis of support for it and ensuring that its language is not out of harmony with the language of the second resolution.

(d) Operative paragraph 2 of the first resolution might be amended as follows, so as to make it correspond more closely with operative paragraph 2 of the refugee resolution, to which the sponsors and the Arabs have agreed: "Notes with regret that, as stated in paragraph 87 of the report, the commission has been unable to fulfil its mandate, as set forth in resolutions 194 (III) of 11 December 1948 and 394 (V) of 14 December 1950."

(e) The following language might be used for paragraph 4: "Urges the governments concerned to seek agreement with a view to an early settlement of their outstanding differences in a spirit of justice and pursuance of resolutions adopted by the United Nations General Assembly, and for this purpose to make full use of United Nations facilities."

(f) We suggested a commission of five instead of seven members, but said nothing about where the headquarters of the commission should be located.

4. In the light of your instructions we have passed on to both delegations this morning the additional amendment suggested for paragraph 5 of the resolution.

5. The State Department does not want the commission expanded if Pakistan is to be a candidate. It is not sure that even the friendliest attempt to secure Arab acquiescence to a series of amendments before the plenary meeting will be successful. The sponsors will discuss strategy this afternoon, however, and may base their talks on our suggested amendments, which they consider useful. We will keep you informed of later developments.

1. We are deeply grateful for your willingness to back up our decision on this complicated controversy, and appreciate to the full the difficult problem we had to put to you in a last minute telephone call.

2. For our part we made every effort to carry out your final instructions:

(a) We failed at first to get agreement among the three groups on the first sentence of the preamble;

(b) It proved absolutely impossible to find another sponsor.

3. We therefore put in our amendments and concentrated on persuading Israel not merely to abstain but to agree. This effort was successful.

4. After we introduced our amendments the sponsors, the Arabs, and Israel paid tribute to what they were pleased to call our constructive efforts. Everyone else with five Cominform exceptions seemed pleased. A paragraph by paragraph vote was avoided and the amended resolution passed with 48 in favour (including Canada, Israel, and all the Arabs except Iraq) to 5 against (Soviet bloc) and one abstention (Iraq).

5. This is the kind of majority we were working for. It was obtained by very hard work on short notice by a great number of delegations. Everyone was so gratified by the outcome of the vote that they took our forthright lecture reserving our financial position on assistance to Palestine refugees with a surprising absence of protest.

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL

Paris, January 29, 1952

Dear Escott,

In a sense I want to apologize for the sudden telephone call on Palestine which must have startled you a little. We realized to the full that we were presenting you on a moment's notice with a problem the nature of which could not be fully explained in a telephone conversation. Had it not been for the Minister's final injunctions to Mr. Lesage to be particularly careful to consult Ottawa before doing anything on Palestine, we probably would have taken the decision in the delegation. However, we felt that we had to be sure of the Government's support and we picked you as the senior person most likely to be familiar with the general problem. I am sorry that we had to throw it at you on such short notice and so incompletely. It is always difficult to know how far a delegation should use its own judgment in a last-minute crisis. In this case, however, we felt that because the decision was essentially political our hands were tied.

As the result of fast-moving developments, we were faced at the last minute with the following situation:

a) The Arabs had secured a last-minute victory in the vote in the Ad Hoc Committee on four paragraphs of the draft resolution on the Palestine Conciliation Commission which the Western powers did not like and to which Israel was bitterly opposed;

b) If the Arabs failed to get the two-thirds majority for which they were working, we should have no decision to continue the attempt to conciliate the Palestine dispute. This would represent a defeat for Canadian policy, which is directed toward securing a peace settlement within the framework of the United Nations;

c) Israel was working hard to secure a vote which would knock out the four objectionable paragraphs, and would not have been unhappy if the whole resolution was lost, since they would have been in a position to revive their proposal for a Good Offices Committee with much more limited terms of reference than the Conciliation Commission;

d) During the day on which we telephoned you, Jessup had won over the Arabs to accept concessions on the three operative paragraphs to which Israel objected if the sponsors would agree to let them keep a recital in the preamble;

e) The sponsors were very anxious to take advantage of the Arab concession, since they felt an Arab defeat on a straight vote on the resolution as adopted in

Committee would have disturbed the atmosphere in the Near East seriously, and would almost certainly have prejudiced the whole programme for Palestine refugees;

f) Both Israel and the sponsors were confident of our good will and disinterested approach and it seemed that no other delegation could put in the necessary amendments with any hope of having them passed.

We were convinced, moreover, that even if Israel failed to get their way in regard to one paragraph of the preamble, or in regard to strategy in dealing with the resolution, their objections would be of a minor and ephemeral nature and would not affect their long-term policy. We were seriously worried that a defeat for the Arabs would have lasting and harmful effects.

We were all very much encouraged to get the Department's reply so promptly promising to back up our judgment. As things turned we were even more right than we had imagined about the mildness of Israel's objections. When your telegram arrived in the early morning of January 26, everyone concentrated their efforts on Eban. Among others, Jessup and I urged him to make a real contribution to improving the atmosphere in the Near East and after some hesitation he decided to go along. Therefore, we have helped to ward off a situation that might have been very unfortunate.

I do not give much weight to the utterances of Choukayri<sup>13</sup> of Syria — who is at least two-fifths ham — but it is of some interest to note that in speaking for the Arabs, he described the Canadian representative as a man of dignity, sober mind, and sound judgment, who considered it his duty to fill many gaps and many loop-holes, and who performed his task “diligently and with devotion”. “His task is a task of conciliation, of bridging difficulties, and we express our gratitude and appreciation to the distinguished representative of Canada.” The friendliness of his tone was something we hadn't expected, since we had spoilt three of their favourite paragraphs.

What I think should please us particularly, and the Minister would probably like to know of it, is Eban's statement that “the work undertaken by the Canadian delegation in this field is in full conformity with the positive and constructive role which that government has played in all developments in United Nations treatment of the Palestine question.”

All this will be recorded in detail in our final report, but I thought I should send you a personal note of explanation. This question of urgent consultation between the delegation and the Department is something that should be discussed when the post-mortem is held.<sup>14</sup>

Yours sincerely,

[R.M. MACDONNELL]

Record of telephone conversation held on January 25, 1952 between Members of Delegation to the General Assembly of the United Nations and Deputy Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL

Paris, February 4, 1952

Miss MacCallum opened the conversation by saying that the Delegation wished to be sure that it had the Department's approval of what it had been doing in carrying out its instructions with regard to the Palestine question. The Delegation had been asked to concentrate on getting the resolution on the Palestine Conciliation Commission amended so as to make it acceptable to the sponsoring powers and sufficiently palatable to Canada and Israel to permit of an affirmative vote or an abstention.

2. Negotiations with the four sponsors of the resolution had borne results and there were now two amendments which the Canadian Delegation would put forward if the Department agreed. Their purpose was to tone down two of the four most controversial paragraphs so as to enable the parties either to vote in favour of these paragraphs or to abstain. If the amendments were put in by Canada the sponsors had made an arrangement with the Arabs which would look after the two other controversial paragraphs. The sponsors would abstain on the first recital of the preamble recalling "all" previous resolutions of the General Assembly on Palestine, to which Israel was very much opposed, while the Arabs would respond by abstaining on operative paragraph 6, which would have enabled them to appoint a Muslim state to an expanded Conciliation Commission. The sponsors opposed the expansion of the Commission and an Arab abstention would ensure that this paragraph would be dropped.

3. The resulting resolution, minus paragraph 6, with two paragraphs amended and the first recital of the preamble retained, would probably command well over a two-thirds majority of the Assembly. There was still the difficulty that although Israel would be glad to have paragraph 6 eliminated, and although it would abstain on the two paragraphs as amended by Canada, it had not yet agreed to abstain on the first recital of the paragraph, and its objection to the reference to "all" previous United Nations resolutions on Palestine meant that all the conditions mentioned in the Department's instructions to the Canadian Delegation had not been met. The arrangements just described had been worked out, however, in a series of long conferences between the sponsors and the Arabs on the basis of four proposed amendments given to the sponsors by the Canadian Delegation, and the arrangement seemed to offer the best means of obtaining a two-thirds majority in the Assembly.

4. Israel was disappointed that amendments were being brought in in an effort to save the resolution. It would have preferred to have the objectionable paragraphs fail for lack of a two-thirds majority. It felt particularly strongly on paragraph 1 of the preamble and was unhappy because the sponsoring powers had decided not to vote against it. The sponsoring powers, however, had given very careful consideration to their position. The Arabs were yielding on three issues in the operative part of the resolution and it therefore seemed worth while to make a concession to them by retaining the reference to "all previous resolutions of the General Assembly on Palestine" in a recital in the preamble.

5. Mr. Reid said the Minister was away from Ottawa and could not be consulted. The complex nature of the arrangements described by Miss MacCallum made him feel that it would be impossible for him to give a definite and immediate opinion, since he had not seen the text of the proposed Canadian amendments or studied them in relation to the draft resolution as a whole.

6. Mr. Macdonnell then explained that the Delegation wanted to take a lead which would preserve a great deal of the work done by the Committee both on the Palestine Conciliation Commission and on Palestine refugees. The Arabs felt there was a close connection between the question of refugees and the question of a final political settlement, and if the plan for handling the resolution on the Conciliation Commission fell through, the danger was that the Arabs, having suffered what they would regard as a very serious defeat, would not be able to co-operate fully when it came to carrying out the suggestions of the Relief and Works Agency and that the work of cleaning up the refugee situation would be impeded. They had offered to make very considerable concessions with regard to the P.C.C. resolution. Israel's interests were not being damaged and their momentary dislike for the recital in the preamble would probably not have lasting effects.

7. In answer to a question from Mr. Reid, Mr. Macdonnell said that the Delegation was not in any doubt on its voting positions. One thing that had caused Mr. Johnson some concern was whether it would be thought presumptuous by the Department if the Canadian Delegation took the lead in proposing amendments which, when the whole thing was voted would leave Israel with a certain disappointment about the first paragraph of the preamble. Mr. Macdonnell said he wished to make it clear that, if the Canadian Delegation did not actually bring in the amendments proposed, or if somebody else did not, a great deal of the resolution would be knocked out and that an extremely messy situation would result which ought to be avoided at all costs.

8. Mr. Reid suggested that the sponsors should try to get another delegation to move the amendments. Mr. Macdonnell replied that at this late hour it would be quite impossible for the sponsors to get another neutral delegation to do this. The proposed amendments went a long way to meet Israel's objections but, because they did not go all the way, Israel was not happy about the plan. The sponsors had succeeded in getting the Arabs to back down considerably. The Conciliation Commission would not be increased in size. Israel was winning in substance and it seemed a pretty fair deal.

9. Mr. Reid did not feel that in Mr. Pearson's absence he should make a decision but undertook to get in touch with the Prime Minister and let the Delegation know either by telephone or most immediate telegram what the Prime Minister's wishes were. Mr. Macdonnell added that if there was a collapse the Canadian Delegation would be held responsible by those who knew about the negotiations.

SOUTH WEST AFRICA

Addressed to External No. 271 repeated London No. 311.

Following from Johnson, Begins:

1. Jooste<sup>15</sup> of the South African Delegation called on me this morning to discuss South West Africa. He had received instructions from Dr. Donges,<sup>16</sup> who will not return to Paris until January 1st or 2nd, to have preliminary conversations on a bilateral basis with delegations of the Administering Powers and of certain other "responsible" countries.

2. Jooste began by saying that he could not tell us exactly what had been decided during Donges' consultations with the South African Cabinet. He emphasized, however, that the matter had reached a point where in his governments view "some positive stand was required" of South Africa. The Union Government was not for the time being concerned with the two substantive resolutions which had been recently adopted by the Fourth Committee. It intended, however, to bring before a plenary meeting of the Assembly the "constitutional issue" involved in the Fourth Committee's invitations to the Hereros and to the Rev. Michael Scott. Jooste was not sure of the most feasible means of bringing this constitutional issue before a plenary session. He hoped that the Assembly's debate on the Fourth Committee's substantive resolutions on South West Africa might provide the occasion. If not, South Africa might have to ask, through the General Committee, for a new item to be placed on the agenda. In any case, South Africa would find a way of confronting the General Assembly with a draft resolution challenging the legality of the Fourth Committee's decisions to grant hearings to the Hereros and Michael Scott. (The legal arguments adduced by South Africa with regard to the Hereros are contained in Dr. Donges' letter to the President of the Assembly, a copy of which was sent to you with my letter No. 67 of November 27th.)

3. In very forceful terms Jooste repeated what Donges had said in a Commonwealth meeting a month ago (see my telegram No. 104 of November 27th) to the effect that the unconstitutional behaviour of the Fourth Committee had grave implications not only for South Africa but for all the Administering Powers. No country, he said, could afford to tolerate such illegal interference in its affairs. South Africa hoped to be able to organize a "united front" of responsible members in support of its case.

4. During the conversation no direct reference was made to our votes on the various issues which arose during the debates on South West Africa. Jooste did, however, express his government's disappointment that some countries had supported the French on Morocco while withholding their support from South Africa on a matter involving "the same principle". He hoped that we would be prepared to take part in further conversations with the South African delegation both on a bilateral and on a more general basis; and he wished to know whether South Africa could count on Canadian support for the course which it intended to follow. In reply to a question Jooste said that he could not predict what his government's reaction would be to the rejection of its proposed resolution. This would depend on how many delegations voted with South Africa and, more important, who they were.

5. I said that I would send you a report of the conversation but that until I heard from you I could not express even a personal view on what our attitude would be. It was left that I would seek instructions and speak to him again in a few days. I gathered that because of the Christmas recess he was having difficulty in approaching some of the delegations concerned. He had seen the French who were "very sympathetic" but as Jessup was out of town he had not yet spoken to the Americans.

6. In view of the importance which South Africa attaches to this question I should be most grateful to know as soon as possible what line we might take in our conversations with them and with other delegations.

7. Most delegations are maintaining only skeleton staffs during the recess. Hence it may be difficult to obtain the views of other delegations until January 2nd. We shall keep you informed of developments.

8. I asked Jooste if the South African High Commissioner in Ottawa would be making independent representations to you. He was not certain but did not think so since Roberts was not fully conversant with the question. Ends.

Addressed External No. 272 repeated London No. 312.<sup>17</sup>

1. We have been giving some thought to the position the Canadian delegation might take on the issue shortly to be raised by South Africa in the General Assembly, namely the legality of the Fourth Committee's decision "to grant the request" of the Hereros Chiefs for a hearing before the Fourth Committee.

2. The South African approach raises the narrow issue of what to do about the invitation to the Hereros and the much broader issue of our solidarity, or lack of it, with administering powers and states in a similar position. Let us take the broader issue first.

It was decided not to refer this to Pretoria or CPD(UN) New York mainly I gather because we did not agree with these views. A telegram went to Delegation in Paris on Dec. 31.

3. In essence, the South Africans want us to support them and the administering powers through thick and thin wherever the problem of nationalist ambitions makes a troublesome appearance. Thus, they would oppose and would like us to oppose most moves by nationalists anywhere in the world, for example, against the French in Morocco or Tunisia or against the United Kingdom in other parts of Africa.

4. Clearly, such a negative approach has no appeal to Canadians. On the other hand, we must not go to the other extreme. Though we have sympathy for those who seek self-government, we also have a strong interest in preventing the development of trouble-spots that would endanger western defence. To take Morocco as an example, the Canadian position is not unlike that of the United States, except that we have no responsibilities in Morocco. There is in both the United States and Canada a good deal of sympathy for Nationalist aspirations. At the same time, it must be recognized that to satisfy those aspirations quickly, in the extreme form advanced by interested trouble-makers, would endanger installations that are of importance, and perhaps of vital importance, to the defence of the west — namely NATO airfields. The same situation may be repeated in Tunisia and Central Africa and elsewhere. South-West Africa is relatively unimportant at the moment, but it may set patterns of considerable significance.

5. In considering this whole range of questions, it seems evident that our interpretation of the Charter cannot take place in a vacuum. It must be related to the needs of the day, one of which is the avoidance of mischievous or irresponsible, or simply well-meaning but ill-conceived, attempts to banish all vestiges of “colonialism” before ascertaining whether anything better or as good (from the point of view of the inhabitants) is ready to take its place. For example, to take Moroccan nationalism at its face value and turn the country over to the vocal anti-French minority would do the inhabitants no service and would prejudice NATO efforts as far as airfields are concerned. At the same time, Canadians sympathize with the desire of nationalists everywhere to run their own show. There are no sharply defined blacks and whites in this picture, and both nationalist aspirations and the defence requirements of the western world must be borne in mind. We hope you will agree that in this broad field our attitude to specific problems is bound to represent a compromise between these two methods of approach.

6. Proceeding on this realistic, if inglorious, basis of compromise between the theoretically desirable and the practically important, where do we wind up in considering the South Africans and their grievance about the invitation to the Hereros?

7. In deciding to challenge the decision of the Fourth Committee on legal grounds South Africa may have simplified our problem — or they may have complicated it. If your legal advisers are satisfied that South Africa is right in its contention that the Fourth Committee exceeded its powers (and, in our view, South Africa has put forward some pretty convincing arguments), we might vote with South Africa in plenary and explain our previous abstention on the ground that when the vote was taken in the Fourth Committee we had not had sufficient time to examine the legal position.

8. If, however, your legal advisers are of the opinion that the Fourth Committee did not exceed its powers, a more difficult decision faces us. In that event, we should presumably have to vote against South Africa in plenary. In explanation of our vote, we could say that, in our view, the Fourth Committee had power to grant the request of the chiefs to be heard. We could then add that more than a legal problem was involved. Though the action of the Fourth Committee was within its legal competence, it was, we think, of doubtful wisdom. Hence, we abstained when the vote was taken in the Fourth Committee.

9. It seems to us that South Africa's arguments that the resolution is illegal are impressive. Hence, we would hope that we might combine a vote for South Africa with an appeal (which might be made in public or private or both, depending on circumstances) for moderation and good sense all round. We could say that we have real doubts about who is entitled to appear before the United Nations and believe that the subject deserves much more careful and unheated consideration than it has received. We could appeal to both sides to stop and think and not take up hard and fast positions. To the anticolonialists, we could suggest that irritating South Africa is not an end in itself of very great value and that there are advantages in keeping South Africa as part of the free world. To the South Africans, we could suggest that some respect is due to the honest opinion of the free world about the rights and aspirations of native peoples. Obviously until we know the exact line which the South Africans intend to pursue we cannot work out a Canadian position in terms of resolutions and votes. Can we not, however, start from the basis sketched above of deploring extravagant claims by the Fourth Committee, urging South Africans to recognise that the Fourth Committee represents not only malevolence and irresponsibility but also a sincere desire on the part of some members to find the right path in a complicated situation and thus try to prevent a hardening of positions on both sides?

SOUTH WEST AFRICA

Reference: Your telegram No. 272 of December 29.

An examination is, as you suggested, being made here into the legal grounds for the contention by South Africa that the Fourth Committee exceeded its powers in deciding to hear the Hereros. Meantime could you ascertain the views of the United Kingdom and United States delegations as to the legality of the Fourth Committee's action?

2. While the question of satisfying nationalist aspirations in non-self-governing territories, as your telegram points out, needs very careful consideration in view of the importance of safeguarding NATO airfields and other defence installations, it is not clear that this has much bearing on the Southwest African question now before the Assembly. So far as we are aware, there is not as yet in Southwest Africa a nationalist demand for self-government. The question at issue in the Assembly is not a grant of self-government to Southwest Africa, but merely the extent of international supervision which it may be possible to exercise over South Africa's administration of the mandate. Southwest Africa, including its defence installations, will undoubtedly remain completely under South Africa's control, regardless of the action the Assembly takes.

3. The Canadian Government will wish to give the most careful consideration to the position which it should take when South Africa raises in the Assembly the question of the legality of the Fourth Committee's action. It will not be possible in the meantime to make any commitment to support South Africa, as suggested by Jooste in paragraph 4 of your telegram No. 271 of December 27. If possible, delay would be desirable before the question comes up in the Assembly, in order to give time for mature consideration by all countries concerned.

4. We would appreciate any information you can obtain as to the views of the Scandinavian countries.

SOUTH WEST AFRICA

Addressed Ottawa No. 299, repeated London No. 7.<sup>19</sup>

We were represented yesterday at a meeting on South West Africa attended also by representatives of Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, and United Kingdom. The purpose of the meeting was to give Dr. Donges an opportunity to explain the intentions of the South African Government on the matters raised with us by Jooste on December 27 (my telegram No. 271 of December 27).†

2. Dr. Donges spoke, in essence, as follows. He had been impressed during his visit to South Africa with the indignant state of all sections of public opinion regarding the South West African question. In the action which it had already taken the government had general support throughout the country. In order to satisfy mounting demands for further concerted action, it had decided to seek an opportunity of tabling in plenary session a resolution (text contained in my immediately preceding telegram) challenging the legality of the Fourth Committee's action in granting hearings to the Hereros and to Michael Scott. The object of narrowing the issue to purely legal grounds was to attempt to gain the support of countries which would not support South Africa on the substance of the case. South Africa hoped that "the nations whose opinions really count" would see that the action taken by the Fourth Committee was a symptom of the wider tendency, apparent at this session, viz., the trend towards unjustified criticism of the administering powers and illegal interpretations of the charter. This trend had been illustrated by the claim of an irresponsible majority that the Fourth Committee was empowered to discuss political affairs in non-self-governing territories.

3. Donges continued that in view of the hostility of the majority, South Africa had no illusions about the result of the vote on its resolution but hoped to win the support of a responsible minority. He was not sure of the best tactics for introducing it. He did not favour attempting, through the General Committee, to place a new item on the agenda. It would therefore be necessary, under Rule 67 of the Rules of Procedure, to obtain the support of one-third of the members present and voting for a discussion of the Rapporteur's report on the South West African item. The repercussions in South Africa would be "unpredictable" if he was deprived of putting (word omitted) his government's case. Assuming, however, that the necessary support for discussion of the report was obtained, he would take the opportunity to emphasize the constitutional issue and he would close his speech by proposing his resolution.

4. A frank exchange of views followed on the feasibility and wisdom of the course outlined by Donges. Both the United Kingdom and Australia considered that the resolution would probably be ruled out of order on the ground that it raised a new matter not related to the substantive resolutions contained in the Rapporteur's report. In reply Donges reported that he would relate his resolution not to the substantive resolutions on South West Africa but to those parts of the Rapporteur's report which referred to the Hereros and Michael Scott. Jooste had seen the President of the General Assembly, whose initial reaction to this argument was that such a resolution would not be out of order. In response to a United Kingdom objection that the present text of the resolution did not make specific enough reference to the Rapporteur's report, Donges said he could make the necessary textual adjustments.

5. The Australian representative, while generally sympathetic to South Africa, hoped that it would not be necessary to vote on whether or not the resolution was in order. Australia itself would be greatly embarrassed if a vote were necessary, partly because it was uncertain if such a resolution would be in order but principally because, if the resolution were ruled in order, unfortunate consequences might ensue. Certain delegations unfriendly to South Africa might well vote in favour of considering the resolution so as subsequently to vote it down. The effect of its rejection would not only be a defeat for South Africa but would also be an endorsement by the General Assembly of the decisions of the Fourth Committee. This would be an unfortunate development. It would be much preferable for the committee's decisions to remain in dispute than for them to be sanctioned by a formal decision of the Plenary Assembly. As matters now stood it would be possible in future to fight in committee the granting of similar hearings. No such opposition would be possible once the Assembly had decided that in 1951 the Fourth Committee did not exceed its legal competence. In this view the Australian delegation was strongly supported by the United Kingdom. Fitzmaurice, the United Kingdom Legal Adviser, thought that if it became necessary to vote upon the point of order, many of South Africa's friends would pray to be defeated.

6. The Australian representative then stated that in addition to the procedural arguments explained above, Mr. Casey had instructed him to emphasize:

(a) The desirability of South Africa's clearing its intentions with the Americans in view of the general political importance of keeping in step with the United States;

(b) The advisability of obtaining French approval, since to revive the Hereros controversy might lead to renewed trouble over the Moroccan item.

7. Dr. Donges was evidently surprised at the strength of the objections which had been put forward by the United Kingdom and Australia and which were later echoed by New Zealand. After saying that the precedent which might be caused by the Assembly's rejection of his resolution would be no more dangerous than the existing situation in the Fourth Committee, he turned to consider the alternatives open to South Africa. He summarized these as follows:

(a) As a "bare minimum", he could without introducing a resolution, simply state South Africa's position and take no further action. In this hypothetical case he would "expect" friendly countries to make speeches in South Africa's support, drawing attention to the constitutional illegality of the Hereros and Scott hearings. He implied that his present instructions would not permit him to adopt tactics as moderate as this.

(b) He could present South Africa's case, and, again without introducing a resolution, announce that as a protest against the Fourth Committee's actions his delegation would resume its present policy of non-participation. In this case he would again hope that friendly delegations would make speeches supporting South Africa on the constitutional issue and that they would abstain on the Rapporteur's report containing the two substantive resolutions on South West Africa, even though they had supported these resolutions in the Fourth Committee. He realized that this would pose a problem for countries such as Canada and the United States which had supported one or other of these substantive resolutions, but he hoped that they could justify their abstentions on the ground that the Rapporteur's report contained certain sections that were for legal reasons unacceptable. Selwyn Lloyd regarded this as the most desirable course. He hoped that it might be sufficiently strong to appease public opinion in South Africa and he pointed out that it would avoid the dangers which might ensue if South Africa persisted in tabling its draft resolution. Donges doubted if this course would satisfy his government.

(c) He could follow the course he had originally outlined by introducing his resolution at the end of his statement. He enquired directly whether the countries represented would vote in favour on the point of order and both Australia and the United Kingdom reiterated the objections noted in paragraph 5 above. Fitzmaurice pointed out that it would be unrealistic to vote on the point of order without thinking ahead as to the deeper consequences.

8. We did not take an active part in the discussion but confined ourselves to a brief statement based on the relevant parts of your telegram No. 174 of January 2. Donges hopes to see the Americans today or tomorrow, and he is unlikely to speak to us again until their attitude is known.

9. It now seems clear that we shall have to be prepared to meet a number of possible eventualities. These are discussed in my immediately following telegram which offers some suggestions on the line we might follow in each case.

10. It is possible that this question will come up in plenary next Thursday, January 10, although it may be delayed for a few more days. We shall keep you informed.

SOUTH-WEST AFRICA

Addressed to External No. 300, repeated to London No. 8 from Candel.

Following are comments referred to in my immediately preceding telegram on South-West Africa. The problems which are likely to face us within the next week are discussed in the order in which they will probably develop:

(a) We presume you agree that it would be desirable if the South Africans could be dissuaded from submitting their resolution. If the opportunity arises, should we privately add our voice to those of the United Kingdom and Australia in this regard?

(b) We presume that it would be in order for us to support South Africa's request under Rule 67 for a discussion in plenary of the rapporteur's report on the South-West African item.

(c) If South Africa were dissuaded from introducing its resolution, a vote would be called for only on the two substantive resolutions passed by the Fourth Committee. Do you agree that in these circumstances we should vote as we did in committee? The question would also arise whether we should speak, and if so what we should say (1) if the South Africans merely registered a forceful protest on the constitutional issue, and (2) if they decided to resume their current boycott of the Assembly.

(d) If the South Africans decided to persist with their resolution, we should have to decide (1) how to vote on the point of order whether the resolution was admissible, (2) if the resolution was admitted, how to vote on the legal issue and (3) whether to speak and what to say on either or both (1) and (2) in this paragraph;

(e) With respect to whether we should support admissibility of the resolution, we are impressed with the United Kingdom-Australian argument, and are doubtful if we should vote in favour. Moreover, we fear that Danges' intention to relate his resolution to a part of the rapporteur's report might lead to a dangerous precedent whereby irresponsible elements could clutter up plenary sessions with any number of draft resolutions unrelated to or at variance with the resolutions adopted by main committees in their consideration of each item.

We should, therefore, suggest that we might abstain on or vote against the admissibility of the resolution. We are uncertain whether at that stage we should make a statement.

(f) Finally, if the resolution were admitted, we should be faced with the need to vote on the legal issue, and with a pretty clear obligation to make a statement. So far as possible, we have ascertained the legal positions of the delegations mentioned in your telegram No. 174; a summary will follow very shortly. We do not feel competent to suggest a position on the legal issues but we feel that in any statement we make, even on the legal rights and wrongs, it would be difficult not to adopt an understanding one towards South Africa, the degree of warmth to be related to the course of action the South African Government decides to follow, as well as to your assessment of the validity of the South African legal argument.

2. We should be grateful for instructions on the position we should take in the various situations described above, and to have guidance for any statement you consider it would be advisable to make.

I have considered the points raised in your telegram and my view is that you should follow the course outlined below:

(a) We should not, repeat not, add our voice to those of other countries which are privately appealing to South Africa to drop its resolution. In the past we have not intervened on this question and to do so now might lead the South Africans to think that we are showing belated sympathy for the consequence of our action in voting for the resolution "regretting" South Africa's attitude. (b) We should support South Africa's request under rule 67 for a discussion in plenary of the rapporteur's report.

(c) If a point of order is raised on whether the South African resolution is admissible, we should vote to sustain the ruling of the President of the Assembly, unless we have any doubts about the correctness of a Presidential decision against admissibility, in which case we should abstain.

(d) On the South African resolution itself, that is the legal issue as to whether the Fourth Committee exceeded its powers, we should abstain.

SOUTH WEST AFRICA

Addressed External No. 364, repeated to London No. 41.

1. The Fourth Committee agreed on January 10, without vote, to hear a further statement from Michael Scott, prior to concluding its consideration of the South West Africa item. Scott gave his statement on January 11, recounting the unsuccessful efforts made by the Hereros to travel to Paris, and urging the committee not to relax its determination to hear their evidence at first hand. He suggested that, in view of South Africa's refusal to permit the chiefs to come to Paris, the United Nations might consider sending a mission to South West Africa to verify the validity of the Hereros' claims.

2. After a round of tributes to Scott, the committee voted on a resolution transmitting his statement to the ad hoc committee on South West Africa and directing the rapporteur "to express in the report to the General Assembly its (the Fourth Committee's) regrets for not having been able to hear the Herero chiefs." Together with the United States, the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand, Belgium, France, the Netherlands, and Ethiopia we abstained on this resolution which received 40 votes in favour with none against. During the meeting the Chairman proposed that the ad hoc committee on South West Africa, reconstituted in the resolution passed by the Fourth Committee on December 11, should be the same as in 1951, with the exception of Denmark's replacement by Norway. There was no objection.

3. With these decisions, the committee has completed its work on the South West Africa item. The Secretariat has not as yet decided when to place the item before a plenary session, nor have the South Africans indicated whether they will insist on tabling their resolution.

1. At the invitation of the South African delegation, I attended a meeting yesterday on South West Africa. The United Kingdom, Australia, and New Zealand were also represented.

2. From Donges' account of recent developments, it appears that South Africa has gone some way towards recognizing the validity of the objections raised by Australia and the United Kingdom at the Commonwealth meeting on January 5 (para. 5 of my telegram No. 299). Donges began by saying that his present instructions would not permit him to refrain from submitting his resolution. He added the qualification, however, that if the President ruled his resolution inadmissible, or if it was voted out of order by the Assembly, he would make no further effort to force it to a vote, and would be content if a number of speeches sympathetic to South Africa were made during the debate on the rapporteur's report.<sup>23</sup>

3. Both Lloyd (United Kingdom) and Officer (Australia)<sup>24</sup> repeated in the strongest terms their hope that South Africa would not insist on presenting its resolution. They emphasized the potential danger of the precedent which would be set if the Assembly were given the opportunity to reject the resolution and thus endorse the Fourth Committee's action. Officer asked whether all the possible means of satisfying South African public opinion had been exhausted. He suggested, with support from Lloyd, that instead of tabling the resolution and risking a heavy rejection, Donges might consider concluding his speech in plenary with a formal declaration asserting the illegality of the Fourth Committee's decisions regarding the Hereros and Michael Scott. In this way, embarrassing votes, on which South Africa might not be able to count on the support of its friends, would be avoided. Moreover, countries sympathetic to South Africa could speak more strongly against the Fourth Committee if they knew that they would not subsequently have to participate in a difficult vote on the constitutional issue. Both the United Kingdom and Australia said that they would have to abstain on such a vote. It is clear that both are under instructions to put the strongest pressure on South Africa. Behind these instructions there is evidently the conviction that while the South African plan to indict the Fourth Committee may suit the Union Government, it will work to the future disadvantage of other countries with colonial responsibilities. According to this line of thought the South Africans, who claim to be acting in the best interests of countries with colonial responsibilities, would be scoring a point (to placate opinion at home) at the future expense of those very countries.

4. Donges was at first inclined to argue that if states were anxious to avoid a vote on this resolution, they should support the position that it was inadmissible. He implied that it would not be fatal if the resolution were still-born as long as he got the support of a respectable minority. It was, however, pointed out to him that to rely on the resolution's being declared inadmissible would be a risky gamble. Recent plenary sessions had shown that the President was unwilling to take a strong line of any kind, and there was therefore little reason to hope that he could be depended upon to rule the resolution out of order. In any event the critics of South Africa might successfully challenge such a ruling, in order to administer a resounding defeat to the South African resolution.

5. Towards the end of the meeting, Lloyd again underlined the importance which the United Kingdom attaches to avoiding a vote on the South African resolution by asking Donges to accept Officer's suggestion outlined in paragraph 3 above. Donges eventually agreed to put this suggestion to his government, but he implied that it was of some importance to him to know what form of support he could expect from the other older Commonwealth countries if South Africa agreed to withdraw its resolution. The United Kingdom, Australia, and New Zealand representatives indicated that in that case they would make speeches supporting South Africa and criticizing the Fourth Committee. I said that, as at present instructed, we could not be of much help to South Africa. Lloyd thereupon hinted that some countries which had voted in favour of the Fourth Committee's resolution "regretting" South Africa's attitude, might alter their vote to an abstention if South Africa would agree not to persist with its resolution. As the Canadian delegation was the only one present which had supported the resolution in question, Lloyd was evidently addressing his remarks to us. Lloyd and I had a short discussion after the meeting, during which he said that if Mr. Eden was now in Ottawa he proposed to suggest to him that he should discuss the matter with you.

6. In view of the importance which the United Kingdom obviously attaches to this matter, I should be interested to know if you think we should agree to abstain on the substantive ("regretting") resolution in question, if this would help to dissuade the South Africans from presenting their resolution condemning the Fourth Committee. I am not sure how much effect such a concession on our part might have on South Africa, but I gained the impression yesterday that some evidence of increased Canadian support might be influential with the South African Government. I am impressed with the dangerous consequences which would almost certainly ensue if a precedent were established for the hearing of groups or individuals from areas other than trust territories, and I therefore feel that we should consider carefully if there is anything we can do to prevent a vote being taken on the South African resolution. Since our attitude might be a determining factor at this stage, I think the circumstances warrant not necessarily a change but at least a review of the instructions contained in paragraph (d) of your telegram No. 209.

7. While I have not had time to go into the question thoroughly, I am not entirely convinced by the legal arguments prepared by your department and this reinforces my feeling that on political grounds a re-examination of our attitude is worth considering. It might also be desirable to have a further look at the legal position in the light of the following considerations:<sup>25</sup>

(a) The Charter provides for the acceptance and examination of petitions by the United Nations only in respect of territories under the trusteeship system.

(b) According to the advisory opinion of the International Court, South Africa, though not obliged to place South West Africa under the trusteeship system, is required to transmit petitions to the United Nations from inhabitants of South West Africa. Nothing is said in the opinion about the right of those persons to be granted oral hearings.

(c) The desirability of limiting petitions or hearings to cases specifically provided for in the Charter.

(d) The serious consequences which might flow if the General Assembly decides that committees are free to grant hearings to persons who ask for them. Trouble-makers not only from trust territories but colonial territories and sovereign states may ask for hearings.

SOUTH WEST AFRICA

1. South Africa's request under Rule 67 for a discussion of the Fourth Committee report on South West Africa was upheld yesterday afternoon in the plenary session. Seventeen delegations voted in favour (including Canada), eighteen against, and twelve abstained, with the result that the required one-third was obtained.<sup>27</sup> This vote was taken at the opening of the meeting following which the Assembly disposed in two and a half hours of all other items on the Fourth Committee's agenda.

they just made it!

2. After first asking in vain for an adjournment until today, Donges then addressed the Assembly for just over an hour. It was a forceful and well presented<sup>28</sup> statement which concentrated largely on the illegality and the dangerous implications of the Fourth Committee's action in deciding to grant hearings to the Hereros and Michael Scott. Donges described the behaviour of the Fourth Committee towards South Africa as "maladroit, vindictive, and unconstitutional". He did not table his resolution, but concluded his statement with a formal charge against the Fourth Committee on constitutional grounds, and with an announcement that the South Africans would not take part in any vote on the draft resolutions submitted by the Fourth Committee on this item.

3. For the most part the substance of Donges' speech was along the lines anticipated. About half of it was devoted to a detailed presentation of the South African legal case, with which you are familiar. This case was, however, supplemented by a number of other arguments among which the following predominated:

(a) Even if the decision to grant hearings to the tribal chiefs had been legal, the particular chiefs invited were by no means representative of the bulk of the population of South West Africa, and in any case could have been of no assistance in dealing with the item under discussion;

(b) Michael Scott was even more unqualified to speak for the indigenous people, and in fact had misrepresented his qualifications to do so;

(c) The natives of South-West Africa were better off than they had ever been, and many of their important chiefs attributed this to the efforts of the Union Government;

(d) Every member State of the United Nations was entitled to the right of protection against unfair and unjust action by fellow members. South Africa could not tolerate "outrageous insults from countries whose energies might far better have been employed in sweeping before their own doors". South Africa was contributing in Korea to United Nations resistance against aggression and its domestic policies were being subjected to unwarranted attacks by countries which were not. If these attacks persisted, South Africa would be forced to retaliate in kind.

(e) This incident was more than a gesture of revenge in a vendetta of some countries against South Africa; it was "a symptom of an ailment in the body politic of the United Nations." Other such symptoms were the unjustified demand to discuss political conditions in the non-self-governing territories and the growing disposition to interfere in matters falling within the domestic jurisdiction of States. No organization could survive if its members disregarded the principles on which it was founded. If the United Nations took no steps to arrest this tendency it would be condoning breaches of the Charter, and could never again ask member States to respect or observe authorities which it itself had ignored.

(f) For the practical point of view the invitation to Michael Scott underlined a dangerous precedent. If the Assembly allowed this latitude to one individual, it was a short step to the point where much of the Assembly's time would be consumed in listening to the real or imagined grievances of minority groups which would be exploited by other nations for ulterior purposes. Unless the provisions of the Charter were rigidly adhered to, the organization would have to sacrifice the attainment of its primary objectives since it would be swamped with petitions and pleas from disgruntled groups and individuals.

4. At the conclusion of his statement Donges read his formal complaint against the Fourth Committee together with the bases of the charge. A verbatim excerpt of this part is given in my immediately following telegram. Full text of the statement will be sent to you in the next bag.

SOUTH-WEST AFRICA

Addressed to External No. 417, repeated to London No. 57.

After an unexpectedly mild debate, the Assembly concluded the South-West Africa item this morning. No new resolutions were tabled, and the only substantive votes taken were on the two resolutions proposed in the rapporteur's report. Although South Africa carried out its announced intention of not participating in these votes, its delegation did not withdraw from the meeting. There is general relief, shared by some members of the South African delegation, at the outcome of the whole episode.

2. Before the meeting began, we were informed that a Latin American move was afoot to apply the closure to the debate before any other delegations had had an opportunity to speak. This motion, however, was not immediately forthcoming, and Jebb (United Kingdom) led off with a restrained and lucid defence of the South African legal argument. He was followed by Madame de Larragoitti (Brazil) who employed her considerable dramatic powers in defence of the Fourth Committee and in justification of the credentials of Michael Scott and the tribal chiefs concerned. Much of her statement was a repetition of the emotional arguments used in committee by the leading critics of South Africa. For a time, it appeared that she would touch off an unpleasant debate, but she concluded with a motion for closure on the ground that each side had now been heard and that it would be in the general interest to leave it at that. This motion was defeated on a vote of 23 in favour of closure, 24 (including Canada) against, and 12 abstentions. We voted against the closure at this stage because we considered that in principle it was unwise to extinguish the debate so soon after Rule 67 had been applied, and because Donges spoke in favour of continuing.

3. There followed 7 further statements, 4 of which (the Netherlands, New Zealand, Australia, and France) supported South Africa on the legal issue, and 2 (Uruguay and Iraq) took the opposite position. The Iraqi, who was remarkably conciliatory considering his performance in committee, concluded his statement with a further motion for closure. Before the vote was taken, however, Sardar Malik (India) explained that his delegation wished to speak after lunch, and moved the adjournment, which under Rule 78 took precedence over the motion for closure. The vote on adjournment resulted in the peculiar figures of 19 in favour, 19 against, and 19 abstentions, and was thus defeated. The motion for closure was then put and carried by 32 in favour, 10 against with 17 abstentions. In spite of South Africa's desire to have the debate continue, we abstained, because we considered that a debate of reasonable length had taken place and because it seemed that more harm than good would come from dragging it out further. Moreover we felt that since South Africa had received support from 5 speakers, very little more open support for her would be forthcoming.

4. The Assembly then voted on the two substantive resolutions in the rapporteur's report. The "regretting" resolution was adopted by 45 votes (including Canada) to 5 (the Soviet bloc) with 8 abstentions (Australia, Belgium, Guatemala, Iceland, Luxembourg, New Zealand, Turkey, and the United Kingdom). This differed from the committee vote in that Iceland, Luxembourg, and Turkey, absent in committee, replaced Mexico, Peru and Yugoslavia among the abstainers. The vote on the second resolution was 36 in favour, none against, with 22 abstentions (including Canada), as against 33-0-17 in committee.

5. Before the meeting closed, Sardar Malik,<sup>29</sup> on the pretense of explaining his vote, managed to deliver most of the speech which he had intended to give in the general debate. Malik was most impressive in replying to that part of Donges' statement in which he had said that if other countries persisted in criticizing South Africa's domestic policies, South Africa would retaliate in kind. India, Malik said, admitted that injustices existed within its borders, but was conscious of and humiliated by them, and was doing its best to see that they were rectified. This was a telling answer to Donges, who had denied that South Africa had anything for which to apologize; it was also a courageous admission, of a sort rarely made in the United Nations. Malik also contrasted South African native policy with the enlightened efforts being made in the United States to deal with problems of racial discrimination. This very effective speech was clearly out of order as an explanation of vote, but the President, in the absence of objections from the floor, allowed Malik to finish and then immediately adjourned the meeting.

6. The principal question arising out of this debate is why the critics of South Africa deliberately ignored the opportunity to retaliate against Donges. Two possible answers occur to us:

(a) That by linking South Africa's complaint with the long-term interests of other members, Donges may have managed to give some pause to countries which have hitherto had a field day at the expense of the Administering Powers but which have nothing to gain from a progressive undermining of the United Nations;

(b) That the critics of South Africa do not wish to give that country an excuse for leaving the United Nations. From the South African point of view, the debate could obviously have turned out much less satisfactorily, and no doubt it would have done so if Donges had decided to table his resolution. The Administering Powers, who had advised strongly against the resolution, are greatly relieved by the fact that the airing of South Africa's grievances did not lead to a formal endorsement by the Assembly of the Fourth Committee decisions to hear the chiefs and Michael Scott.

GENERAL ASSESSMENT OF THE SIXTH SESSION OF THE UNITED NATIONS ASSEMBLY

Reference: Our telegrams Nos. 125 of December 3 and 252 of December 21, 1951 and your telegram No. 206 of January 9, 1952.†

Addressed External No. 533, repeated Dominion London No. 130.

1. The Sixth Session of the Assembly came to an end on February 5th with few regrets. As you said in your recent message of congratulations to the delegation (which was much appreciated), it has been a difficult and frustrating session, though probably no more so than in recent years.

2. In this final review I propose to concentrate on the work of the session since the new year. Some of the general observations we will try to make, however, will necessarily overlap with some of our earlier comments. We are, of course, very conscious that we have been completely immersed in the Assembly, to the exclusion of almost everything else, and yet are attempting judgments before the dust has had time to settle.

An American Assessment

3. A few days ago Dr. Jessup told the American Club in Paris that if Mr. Vyshinsky had reported to the Polit-Bureau [sic] honestly on his return to Moscow the previous week, he would have had to say that the Soviet bloc had failed to make any impression on the free world during this session of the Assembly, and that virtually none of the Assembly's accomplishments had had the benefit of Soviet cooperation.

A Polish Assessment

4. Katz-Suchy,<sup>30</sup> the firebrand of the Polish delegation, has, through his long United Nations experience, built up a number of Western contacts to whom he talks remarkably freely. Usually he is completely cynical about "lines" on both sides. Yet those to whom he has spoken recently are convinced that he believes the Soviet bloc has done very well at this Assembly. He points out that the fishing in troubled waters has been unusually good — notably in the Middle East and North Africa. Never before, he says, has there been such a marked tendency among the Arabs, Asians and Latins to abstain on East-West issues. On secret votes where arms cannot so easily be twisted, the Assembly has, he maintains, shown its real sentiments by nearly electing Byelo-Russia against the candidature of Greece, very strongly supported by the United States. Although the Soviet resolution in favour of a "package deal" admitting all outstanding applicants for membership did not obtain the two-thirds majority the resolution passed in committee in spite of all the violent language Mr. Gross could hurl against it. Most satisfactory of all, from his point of view, was the way in which Mr. Vyshinsky was able, as he claims, to "outmanoeuvre the Americans" and force the United States delegation to adopt publicly a stand against discussing Korea in the United Nations. While United States forces are fighting there under the United Nations label, the United States will not even discuss Korea under the United Nations roof, he concludes.

A Canadian View

5. From the point of view of any Canadian delegation no assessment of the work of the Assembly can be built up on what either side may think that it has achieved or not achieved. Dr. Jessup's verdict on the lack of success of the Soviet bloc is, I think, true as far as it goes but I am sure he would be the first to admit in private that the United States delegation (and the Western delegations generally) have few positive achievements to their credit. They fathered or ghosted a large majority of the resolutions which were passed. They had their way in the end on almost every issue of any importance. But the establishment of the Disarmament Commission was their one major accomplishment, and its long-range importance cannot yet be judged. No one can say, however, that through this Assembly East-West tension has abated, or that much has been done towards bridging the gaps between the North Atlantic countries on the one hand, and the Arabs, Asians and Latins on the other. Although we can say that the tension between East and West is no worse (and that is something these days), the other gaps are probably wider — and certainly with the Arabs and to a lesser extent with the Asians and Latins.

A Two-Power Assembly

6. Although we are hampered by lack of experience of previous Assemblies in making comparisons, I think it is true that never before have the main lines of debate on items in the political committees been left so largely to the Great Powers. Among the smaller delegations, and also in the Secretariat, there was an increasing sense of frustration because the Assembly was not, in fact, deciding any big issues, many of which were not even before it, but had become to a greater degree than in any previous year, a place where the two Great Powers found it convenient to do their arguing.

7. As an example of the attitude of some of the smaller Powers, I cite India. In marked contrast to the role they played at the last Assembly, the Indian delegation was one of the most passive this year on nearly all political subjects, resting comfortably behind the formula that if the United States and the Soviet Union were not agreed on an issue they would abstain as nothing but propaganda and increasing tension could result. There was nothing comparable during this Assembly to the initiative taken last year, during the Korean negotiations, by Mr. Entezam (Iran),<sup>31</sup> Sir Benegal Rau (India)<sup>32</sup> and yourself.

8. Another symptom of the same feeling was the difficulty, especially in the political committees, of finding speakers until after the United States and Soviet delegations had declared their positions.

9. There were other reasons for the relative passivity of delegations of smaller countries in the political committees. It was apparent to everybody that nothing substantial would be accomplished in the field of disarmament until the Great Powers were ready to agree and their disagreement was evident even before the subject was referred to the First Committee. Marginal agreements, in the Big-Four sub-committee, and the flurry of hopes following Mr. Vyshinsky's concessions, modified slightly this underlying pessimism but did not change it.

10. In contrast to disarmament, the subject which had dominated the previous Assembly — Collective Measures and Uniting for Peace — was not a two-Power subject. Progress could be and was made despite Soviet opposition.

Sir Benegal Rau, Permanent Representative of India to the United Nations; Chairman, Delegation to the Sixth Session of the General Assembly.

This year, as soon as it became apparent that the USSR were not going to take up the Western disarmament proposal seriously, the whole mood of the Assembly sagged.

11. The inactivity of the smaller countries applied chiefly to the two political committees. In other committees, for example Committee Two (Economic), Committee Three (Human Rights) and Committee Four (Trusteeship), smaller countries were very active.

Press

12. The sense of letdown particularly affected the press, in view of the excessive build-up which had been given to the tripartite proposals in November. Some correspondents who came to the session with little or no previous experience of the United Nations re-acted even more strongly against "propaganda speeches" than those who had heard them all too often before. Some members of the press simply stopped coming to the session they were supposed to be covering, took the press handouts and enjoyed themselves in Paris while they wrote about the United Nations wasting time.

Leadership

13. Another reason for the weakness of this Assembly was the lack of leadership. At times when a strong President of the Assembly could have given a lead which would have been followed by a number of smaller countries, Mr. Padilla Nervo<sup>33</sup> did not raise a finger. His leadership has, I regret to say, been non-existent, and even in his function of conducting plenary meetings and co-ordinating the work of committees he had shown few of the qualities which should belong to a man in his high office.

13. [sic] I should add that it was not only the President and the smaller delegations who were to blame for the lack of leadership. On the Western side, Messrs. Acheson, Eden and Schuman, as was to be expected, only attended the Assembly for about two weeks. Of those who remained throughout the Assembly, Mr. Selwyn Lloyd (United Kingdom) and Dr. Jessup (United States) alone were outstanding. Selwyn Lloyd seemed to gain in effectiveness with each intervention he made. His adroitness, moderation and sincerity, particularly when rebutting in the best parliamentary tradition Mr. Vyshinsky's outbursts, were admired by all. Dr. Jessup's integrity and his great gifts of exposition had much to do with the successful outcome of the Assembly's work on disarmament and Palestine. No other member of the United States delegation approached his stature.

14. The French made little attempt to supply leadership and indeed their delegation did not even meet as a delegation for the first month of the Assembly.

Luis Padilla Nervo, Permanent Representative of Mexico to the United Nations; Chairman, Delegation to the Sixth Session of the General Assembly.

15. Mr. Vyshinsky, the only Foreign Minister who stayed for almost the whole Assembly, seldom showed his old brilliance in dialectical debating. Although during the second half of the Assembly he was as violent as ever, he seemed somehow less confident and was on the defensive for most of the Assembly. The Soviet delegation made almost no attempt to discuss its point of view with other delegations, except from time to time with certain Arab and Asian delegations. Only on the elections to the Security Council did they encourage the Polish delegation, the strongest of the satellites, to do some direct lobbying for them.

Political items

16. Apart from disarmament, the other subjects dealt with in the political field by the Assembly since Christmas were for the most part ones in which agreement between East and West was not a pre-condition of their success. Nevertheless, they tended, almost by habit, to slip, into the same kind of propaganda debate. I am thinking here of the items dealing with collective measures, Palestine, Libya, repatriation of Greek children, and the admission of new members. Exceptions were the Soviet item on threats of a new world war (which led directly into the discussion of Korea and a further round on disarmament) and the old Chinese Nationalist charge that the USSR had violated the Sino-Soviet treaty of 1945. While no doubt these Chinese charges were substantially true, the abstentions of all Commonwealth and Western European members showed that many important members saw no useful purpose in pursuing them. Oddly enough, it was during the discussion of these Chinese Nationalist charges that the United States chose without consulting us in advance, to issue their "solemn warning" that any further aggression in South-East Asia would be vigorously resisted.

Korea

17. Before turning to other items, I might mention one which the Assembly decided not to discuss — Korea. At the final plenary meeting of the Assembly there was a demonstration of the common sense and solidarity of the free world which was heartening after so many divisions of opinion and interest which had made themselves apparent on other subjects dealt with during the Assembly. By their votes in favour of adjourning the session without discussing Korea, and calling a special session for the purpose once an armistice has been signed (or an emergency special session if circumstances warrant it), the Arabs, Asians and Latins showed that they still have confidence in the sincerity and good faith of the West in general and the United States in particular. They showed that they do believe the United States wants an armistice as much as anyone but fear that to shift negotiations now to Paris would only delay the negotiations which are proceeding, albeit slowly, in Panmunjom. They might perfectly well have abstained on this question but, with only 2 exceptions, Chile and Yemen, they voted with the West.

Collective Measures

18. Despite the violence of the debate and the large number of weakening amendments accepted by the sponsors, the Collective Measures item was, I think, fairly successful. Apart from the Soviet Bloc, only three countries abstained on the final vote, giving the resolution as overwhelming support as had been given to the "uniting for peace" resolution last year. The significance of this is that the same majority was secured for a resolution that not only continues the work of the Collective Measures Committee but goes a good deal further than the "uniting for peace" resolution. It may not mean additional troops for Korea but it does, I think represent an appreciable enlargement in that the report of the Collective Measures Committee called the "area of collective will" to resist any aggression through the United Nations. No member is in any way committed to take any specific action in the event of aggression but there has at least been some psychological clearing of ground from which practical results may be expected to follow in a concrete case of aggression.

Definition of Aggression

19. While the Political Committee was debating what measures should be taken against an aggressor, several countries were pressing, in the Legal Committee, for a definition of aggression. The International Law Commission had found it impossible to reach agreement, but this did not dissuade the Legal Committee from trying to do so, despite the cautious approach of most Western delegations, including ourselves. An unfortunate split, therefore, developed between NATO and Commonwealth delegations on the one hand and Arab and Latin delegations on the other. This situation gave the Soviet Bloc an opportunity to pose as the defenders of the political and territorial integrity of the smaller nations. Even an innocuous compromise proposed by France and Venezuela to reconsider the whole question at the next session proved partly unsuccessful, and the majority of the Legal Committee insisted that the Assembly should specify that a definition of aggression was "possible and desirable" with a view to ensuring international peace and security. Efforts in plenary to have these objectionable clauses deleted, on the grounds that it pre-judged the whole issue, failed.

Palestine

20. The item to which the Canadian delegation was able to make its most fruitful contribution this session was also the least involved in the East-West struggle — Palestine, which as usual was discussed under two headings, a general peace settlement through the Palestine Conciliation Commission and the rehabilitation of Palestine refugees.

21. The Arab states and representatives of Arab refugees were glad to have a practical plan for rehabilitation of refugees proposed by the Relief and Works Agency and were willing to support it if it was not interpreted as prejudicing the right of the refugees to ultimate repatriation. They insisted, however, that since the refugee question was an important issue in connection with the general peace settlement, they could co-operate in the fulfilment of the Blandford Refugee Plan only if the General Assembly adopted a resolution providing for continued United Nations conciliation efforts in line with resolutions on Palestine adopted in the past. Israel, on the contrary, felt that the time had come for free and direct bilateral negotiations between itself and its immediate neighbours on the basis of existing armistice agreements, with a minimum of United Nations participation. It therefore wanted the four-power resolution on the Conciliation Commission to make as little reference as possible to past resolutions of the General Assembly.

22. In committee the Arabs succeeded in pushing through a number of last-minute amendments which gave them a victory over Israel. The margin of support for these last-minute amendments was so narrow, however, that it seemed likely the resolution would be defeated in the Assembly and that in consequence the possibility of liquidating the refugee problem on the basis of the Blandford Plan would be seriously prejudiced.

23. It seemed to us that Israel might be persuaded to accept some changes in the resolution going part of the way towards meeting the Arab point of view, and that the Arabs might in their turn agree to concessions to Israel.

24. The Canadian delegation proposed four amendments to the sponsoring powers, who undertook the necessary negotiations with the Arab representatives, while the Canadian delegation got in touch with the representative of Israel. In the new atmosphere thus created, an arrangement was reached which resulted in a resolution supported both by Israel and its immediate Arab neighbours and by the overwhelming majority of the Assembly. Only the Soviet Bloc voted against the resolution as amended, while Iraq abstained. The Canadian delegation feels that despite hard words exchanged between parties to the dispute during the debate in committee, it is possible that if a man of Jessup's stature could be released for a few months' work on the Palestine Conciliation Commission before the effects of the compromise resolution have worn off, some progress might be made toward a peace settlement.

Middle Eastern Unrest

25. If our experience with Palestine was happy, it was the only bright spot in an otherwise unrelieved gloom surrounding all matters middle eastern, including the most aggravated ones that were not even brought before the United Nations. Either because the parties to the dispute did not wish to do so (as in the case of Suez, Sudan and Abadan) or because of the very strenuous opposition of one of the interested parties (as in the case of French North Africa). Although Mr. Eban has constantly referred to Israel as "a centre of confidence" in the Middle East, the Israeli representatives were rarely more co-operative than their Arab neighbours. One must, however, agree with Mr. Eban's judgement that "Arab nationalism has not shown a will to fit its aspirations into a framework of international interests." This may continue to be the case so long as the Arabs feel that the Western powers, for purely strategic reasons, intend to perpetuate controls in the Middle East which have been relinquished elsewhere. The judgement of the Arab representatives has apparently been that their aspirations ought not to be fitted into the framework of existing international interests until the desire of Arabs to be rid of foreign intervention has received wider international recognition than is yet apparent.

26. More typical of Arab sentiments and in a way more worrying was the detached "plague-on-both-your-houses" attitude of Faris El Khoury of Syria.<sup>34</sup> This applied not only merely to official Arab statements on the record but often made it difficult for personal contacts established in happier days to be resumed on anything more than a strictly business basis. Far from the gap between the Arabs and the West being bridged, I am afraid that the rift is widening, and the Arabs tell us that those who established Israel and are now intent upon maintaining strategic interests at the expense of the legitimate aspirations of the peoples of the area can expect no better.

27. It would have been of great assistance to the delegation as a whole in handling the important and extremely delicate Middle Eastern questions before this Assembly (and others which might have come before it) if we had had any independent sources of information on Middle Eastern affairs. As it was, we were almost entirely dependent on what we were told by United Nations agencies and by the United States, United Kingdom and French delegations, who of course had very full reports from their respective missions throughout the area.

Arab-Asian Group

28. The Arab-Asian grouping was more in evidence this year than in the past. I understand it began with informal meetings among Arab and Asian delegations on Indonesia following the Delhi conference of 1947. The group met frequently to discuss Korea during the last session and this year have met on all the important subjects before the Assembly. Interestingly enough, the Philippines have not been attending meetings this year and Thailand has been sending only an observer. Both states are regarded by the other Asians as being too much under Western influence. We do not know what has been going on at the meetings of this group but it has seldom voted as a bloc in the same way as the Latin American countries usually do. There have, for example, been several signs of Arab-Latin bargaining of votes, particularly during elections for United Nations office. The Asians have, so far as we can tell, not made deals, except for the election of Sir Benegal Rau to the International Court. Their normal preference seems to be to abstain, and the pattern has even spread this year to include Pakistan which abstained, for example, on the disarmament resolution, using the same formula as India, that without agreement among all the powers, no disarmament proposals were worth anything.

Faris El-Khoury Bey, Chairman, Delegation of Syria to the Sixth Session of the General Assembly.

29. In our telegram No. 252 of December 21, 1951, I mentioned Sir Zafrullah Khan's speech paying "humble tribute" to the Soviet bloc for their support on Morocco and other issues affecting the self-determination of peoples. Zafrullah has tried to make amends since Christmas. He has profusely apologized to the Americans in private. But he has not played as great a role at this Assembly as his abilities would permit, perhaps because of the state of extreme tension throughout the Middle East and the fact that the sympathies of his people are so heavily engaged on the Arab side that any moderating lead he might try to give would be badly received among the Pakistanis and other Moslem peoples to whose leadership he certainly aspires.

Economic and Financial Problems

30. For the under-developed countries, strongly and shrewdly led by Mr. Santa-Cruz of Chile,<sup>35</sup> the high point in the Assembly was their victory in getting the approval of the Assembly for the establishment of a fund which would provide capital for under-developed countries. The item had been passed in committee before Christmas against the strenuous opposition of all the larger potential contributors, including the United States and Canada. It may therefore be a hollow victory. They have won their point of principle, but so long as the West must spend at its present rate for rearmament, the fund will mean nothing in practical terms. Nevertheless, the inability of the "have" countries to dissuade the "have not" countries from voting their project means that we are in for serious trouble in ECOSOC and at future sessions of the Assembly. In fact, aid for under-developed countries will in future stand high on the list not only of economic but of political problems of the Assembly. For essentially it is a political problem as much as an economic one. Realizing they could not stem the tide successfully, the United States delegation were much less active in opposing the resolution in plenary, where it was adopted by a slightly larger majority than in committee.

31. The obvious pre-occupation of the Assembly with political and economic problems has served, in some measure, to divert attention from underlying financial issues. In a sense this might be considered fortunate. In the past, if there have not been resounding successes on the political front, it has always been possible to single out one or more projects, such as the expanded programme for technical assistance, as examples of the kind of economic co-operation that have been nurtured and should be encouraged through the United Nations.

32. Although the record at this session is not entirely negative and there is hope that the expanded programme will attain its objective of $20 million for the next financial period, the continuing demands of re-armament and the other commitments imposed on the United States, United Kingdom, France, Canada and other developed countries as a result of the continuing East-West conflict and the intensified surge of Arab nationalism, have caused them to protest, with good cause and in good faith, against the efforts of the smaller countries to use their voting strength in the Assembly to obtain increased amounts of economic and financial aid both through the United Nations budget and through extra budgetary programmes. These attitudes have been evident both in the debates in the Economic Committee and in the specific examination of financial issues in the Fifth (administrative and budgetary) Committee.

33. The conflicts that have arisen in this field have tended to exacerbate the feeling of divergency between the larger and smaller countries. In this field, as perhaps in no other, the opportunities for constructive action should be greatest. It would seem desirable for the Western world to decide objectively, dispassionately and in the light of its own broader economic aims and long-term interests how far and how fast it is prepared to go in the direction of meeting the legitimate and responsible economic demands of the smaller countries. If this could result in a considered and concerted policy which would allow us to indicate positively at the beginning of an assembly session the direction in which we would be prepared to go, it might encourage that coordination of aims which would enable us to counter or divert attention from untimely, wasteful and ill-considered schemes that might be advanced by some of the more unreasonable elements in the Assembly.

South Africa and the United Nations

34. South Africa's behaviour in the United Nations has never been exemplary, but this year she has made it more difficult than ever for her friends to support her. After the Assembly had declined to take back the Fourth Committee's invitations to Michael Scott and the Hereros Chiefs, the South Africans took virtually no further part in the work of the Assembly. They attended committee meetings (with the exception of the Fourth Committee) but took hardly any direct part in proceedings and refused to vote on anything in plenary meetings, which they attended only as observers. The South African delegation, however, are hopeful that they will be able to turn over a new leaf at the next session. They plan to be strongly represented and to take steps in the meantime to go at least part of the way towards reaching a satisfactory compromise with the ad hoc committee on South West Africa and with the Indian and Pakistan Governments on the Group Areas Act.

Colonial Problems

35. We were disturbed and concerned to note a growing antagonism between states which have colonial responsibilities and those which have none. Conspicuous among this latter group are those which, having been colonies, have recently achieved independence. The anti-colonial nations are probably right in keeping attention focussed on the goal of freedom and independence for all peoples. Yet the colonial powers have a heavy responsibility to make sure that their colonies are ready for independence before it is granted to them. In this field Canada, with its close friendship for nearly all the colonial powers and its sympathy for nationalist aspirations, is often faced with difficult decisions. Though the Canadian delegation did not play an active part in these questions they did, generally speaking, side with the colonial powers.

Waiting to Negotiate from Strength

36. It can hardly be denied that this has been as unproductive an Assembly as any in recent years. The Assembly did not do too badly with the items on its agenda, but for obvious reasons the big issues were not directly before it, or were brought before it only incidentally through other items under discussion. There may be a more profound reason for this than lack of leadership or the nature of the subjects which were discussed. It may be, as one member of the United States delegation has suggested to us, that we should not be dissatisfied with marking time this year — and perhaps next year — while the West is building up the strength from which, we maintain, we will one day negotiate with the Soviet Union.

37. There is, I think, something in this idea. It was suggested in Mr. Acheson's presentation of the Western disarmament proposals. But we should not, I believe, be too complacent about postponing year by year the consideration of the big questions and attempts to negotiate outstanding differences between East and West. After all, the Soviet Government no doubt think in terms of negotiating from strength too; and the day may not be so far off when they will begin to put out feelers for serious negotiations while they still have a preponderance of world power in being. The disarmament proposals, and the Soviet reaction to them in the form of alleged concessions concerning inspection and control, may, in the light of history, be judged to be no more significant than other duels in the cold war. But it is perhaps possible that they will be seen as something more significant as the first tentative steps towards that kind of co-operation on which the United Nations was founded, for which it exists, and without which it has less and less meaning.

Questions for the Future

38. On the basis of our experience at this Assembly we suggest that three important issues before this Assembly will probably be before the next. These are:

- (a) East-West tension;
- (b) The drive of under-developed countries for economic aid;
- (c) Colonial problems.

39. The question of East-West tension is no doubt constantly under review and there is perhaps nothing which we can usefully say in addition to what has been said above on this question. As regards the other two problems, we might consider if Canada would make a greater contribution to their solution than we have done in the past.

40. We might ask ourselves what economic sacrifices we are willing to make in order to bridge gaps between the "haves" and the "have nots" and especially between the Arab-Asian group and the North Atlantic-Commonwealth group. From our efforts to keep in touch with the Arab, Asian and Latin delegations (especially those of Pakistan and India) during this Assembly it became apparent that the main interest of many of these in the United Nations is the amount of technical and economic aid they will receive. The more aid that is available the more likely they are to vote with us on political questions. The less aid that is available the more likely are they to abstain or vote against us on issues dividing the East and West.

41. On colonial questions we might consider if we could not play a more active role. We are not a colonial power and yet we have close friends in both camps. This might be a field in which we could use our influence to help arrest, if not reverse, the growing antagonism between colonial and non-colonial powers.

Note pour le chef de la Direction des Nations unies
Memorandum for Head, United Nations Division

[Ottawa,] February 26, 1952

You asked me to make an analysis of Canadian voting in the General Assembly during the Sixth Session.<sup>36</sup> I have gone through all the verbatim and summary records which are now available, and have noted the times when the Canadian vote differed from at least one of the Three Powers: The United Kingdom, the United States and France. There were 45 such votes. Canada abstained 19 times in this voting.

All these votes were on roll-call; it is practically impossible to say how any country except Canada voted in a "show of hands" vote. Mr. McCardle<sup>37</sup> tells me that no one observer could be sure of who voted how; it would require several people to take notes. The Canadian Delegation obviously did not have enough personnel to do this. This analysis is therefore limited in this way. It is also limited by the small number of votes in which our vote differed from the three powers in relation to the large number of combinations possible.

I attach a chart showing the 45 votes, and the item with which they were concerned. I have tried to eliminate the procedural votes.

According to these votes:

1. Canada abstained 19 times in this voting. Only twice when Canada abstained did the three powers vote together yea or nay: once on the vote on Administrative Unions; once on a vote on Human Rights.
2. Canada always voted with one of the Three Powers in all other cases.
3. Canada, in voting yea or nay, voted with either United Kingdom or United States on all votes but one (Human Rights), when we voted with France and U.S.S.R. (United Kingdom abstained).

J.J. McCardle, American and Far Eastern Division, Department of External Affairs; Advisor, Delegation to the Sixth Session of the General Assembly.

4. Canada voted with U.K. against U.S. (voting or abstaining) 3 times.
Canada voted with U.S. against U.K. (voting or abstaining) 8 times.
5. Canada abstained 3 times when U.S. and U.K. agreed (see 1) (the additional instance — freedom of information).
6. Canada abstained with the U.K. 3 times when U.S. voted against U.S.S.R.
Canada abstained with the U.S. 1 time when U.K. voted against U.S.S.R.
7. Canada abstained 3 times when the U.S. voted against U.S.S.R. and U.K. voted with U.S.S.R.
Canada abstained 3 times when the U.S. voted with U.S.S.R. and U.K. voted against U.S.S.R.
8. U.S. and U.K. voted differently 26 times in the 45 votes.

I think that the only conclusion that may be reached from the figures above is that Canada, on certain issues, acted with some independence. We very seldom voted differently from one or other of the Three Powers. When we did, we abstained. We never once, on a substantive vote, voted against all three powers. We only once voted against both the U.S. and the U.K. Canada seems to have continued to oscillate between these two countries, when they disagreed.

As Mr. Garson said on the radio last night, we probably abstain to protect our future position (as honest broker?), rather than to indicate disagreement with our friends. As he said, abstention when the facts are not known (or, I might add, when a "policy for the West" has not been made) is the intelligent course of action.

INTER-DIVISIONAL POLICY MEETINGS

It is expected that Mr. David Johnson will be in Ottawa for four or five days later in the present month at which time it is planned to hold a series of Inter-Divisional Meetings designed to review conflicts in Canadian policies which were evident at the Sixth Session of the General Assembly of the United Nations. At present it is not yet possible to fix a definite date for these meetings but the present indications are that they will be held either in the week beginning March 17 or during the week beginning March 24.

2. Meanwhile, I think you will be interested in reading the attached correspondence which was precipitated by a memorandum of January 11<sup>38</sup> prepared by Mr. Reid, and which was sent to Mr. Johnson on the same date. Mr. Johnson's reply dated January 23<sup>39</sup> is attached, together with a reply dated January 24<sup>40</sup> from Mr. Chipman, to whom Mr. Reid also sent a copy of his memorandum. Attached is also a further letter to Mr. Johnson from Mr. Reid dated February 6<sup>41</sup> and a memorandum dated February 9+ addressed to this Division by Mr. Reid.

3. I think you will find a number of the points raised in this correspondence of interest to you. We shall keep in touch with you regarding the definite date for these meetings and you will in due course receive a programme and timetable concerning them. Meanwhile, you may wish to attain [retain] the attached correspondence for reference.

The meeting considered the paper of March 28 prepared by the U.N. Division.† Most of the comments made on the first part of the paper (pp 1-3) were reflected in the answers to the "Questions" as shown below. The solution to the problem suggested in paragraph 6 did not meet with favour.

QUESTION 1. Is the policy of attempting to lessen the differences between the western democratic states and the under-developed countries a wise, practical and very important one for Canada?

Yes, but with some qualifications.

It was open to the meeting to decide that (a) more importance than heretofore should be attached to "lessening the differences", and (b) that it should stand relatively higher in the scale of priorities among our other policy aims. The meeting was agreed on (a); not enough importance, for example, had been attached to this policy at the last session of the Assembly. To decide on (b), however, as Mr. Ritchie pointed out involved consideration of the other policies with which this policy must be weighed. A decision on this point might be attempted after the other policy meetings had been held.

The Chairman warned against the "market basket" theory — that there was only so much aid we could give, and that we could do no more than decide on its apportionment. There was no defined upper limit to the amount of foreign aid Canada might give; certainly, if there was a limit, Canada had not come close to reaching it.

QUESTION 2. What are those "differences" which affect the formation of Canadian foreign policy?

It was agreed that the following were the principal differences between the policies of the western democracies and of the under-developed countries:

(1) A different view of Communism: to us, it is a threat; to under-developed countries, it is as much a promise as a threat. Also, a different view of western capitalism: to us it is, however imperfect, still a promise. To them it is nearly as much a threat as a promise.

This, of course, was a generalization, and not equally and universally true: it was largely true of Asia, less true of the Middle East, and perhaps least true of Latin America. There were also differences between the attitudes of the ruling classes and those of the other classes.

The Chairman pointed out that there was less resistance to Communism even of the U.S.S.R. variety because it appeared capable of solving some problems of the under-developed countries that democratic systems could not. It was also noted that the Islamic religion tended to resist Communist influences.

(2) A different view of the Russian threat: to us, Russia is the only country to be feared. To most of the under-developed countries, Russia is only one of several foreign powers under whose domination they might come.

(3) A different interpretation of the concept of international sharing of wealth.

It was affirmed that there were three sorts of interpretation: voluntary charity; aid as the duty of a higher authority; out-and-out egalitarianism. Asia, for example, had progressed as far as the second, but hardly as far as the third which was not accepted within the Asian countries themselves. Mr. Ronning thought the West had still to rid itself completely of the notion of expecting gratitude for charity. Other factors entered into the differences in viewpoint. Mr. Scott noted the time factor; the under-developed countries looked for substantially higher living standards which those now alive would live to enjoy; we thought in terms of half centuries at the least. Mr. Johnson suggested that there was a significant element of opportunism in the attitude of the under-developed countries, a realization that the East-West split provided a chance to extract aid from the West as the price of co-operation. Mr. Norman thought that to the Asian mind the right of a country to develop its own resources in its own way was as important as the right to Western assistance in doing so. Mr. MacKay stressed the importance of Asian hatred of historic western imperialism. (1), (2), and (3) add up, of course, to different notions of the priorities to be given to defence preparations of various sorts.

(4) A different sense of urgency in regard to the abolition of colonialism and other inferior sorts of status; meanwhile, different notions of how metropolitan states should behave, and what the United Nations should do about their behaviour. Detailed discussion of this accepted difference would occur in the meeting on trusteeship matters. Mr. Ritchie thought the point under-emphasized in the paper. Pre-Assembly talks on the point, especially with the French, were recommended.

(5) A different notion of the usefulness and efficacy of written international agreements in the social and humanitarian field. It was agreed that at the last General Assembly this difference showed itself to a considerable extent as one between the "have and the have-not" countries although non-common-law countries (such as France) and sometimes the United States were inclined to stress the importance of written international agreements.

QUESTION 3. Should Canadian policy be to attack the problem along the whole line, or only on selected issues?

The meeting agreed that this question could not be answered by a mere yes or no but was really a point to be borne in mind during the further discussions. The Chairman thought that Canada's position might move a little bit on certain issues from one session of the General Assembly to another.

QUESTION 4. Is it sensible, in considering our attitude toward the under-developed countries, to think of them as one group or must we consider each proposal in relation to each country or group of countries?

In general, the meeting thought there were several aspects in which one could not think of the under-developed countries as one group, e.g. technical assistance to Latin America.

QUESTION 7. On the assumption that our general attitude toward under-developed countries is to be conciliatory, which of the following broad approaches should be used? What are their relative advantages? In respect of each, can Canada play a lone hand, or should we move only in step with our usual friends?

(a) Economic assistance. Although this question was not directly discussed it was pointed out by the Chairman that we were not really purchasing the support of the under-developed countries but were buttressing social systems which were basically sympathetic to the west.

(b) Support for nationalist aspirations. Mr. Ritchie pointed out that political support would have to be given not only in a way that would not impair our defences but would also not impair the prestige and viability of our western allies.

QUESTION 10. Our Delegation has been puzzled [about] how far they should be guided by a legalistic interpretation of the Charter of the United Nations and how far they should resort to political interpretations. What advice can we give them?

The meeting agreed with the Chairman that the United Nations Charter, like any other constitution, is usually interpreted in political terms. It was thought desirable that the Canadian interpretation should, like the British, be as consistent as possible (rather than "legalistic") and not follow the United States practice of manufacturing international law to suit existing circumstances or even the current day's policy. It had been originally Canada's interpretation of the Charter that limitations on the power of the United Nations should be construed narrowly and construed its powers broadly. The provisions of the Charter concerning trusteeship and non-self-governing territories had, however, been an exception. In these clauses — Chapters XI, XII & XIII, — Canada had generally interpreted the Charter in a narrow and rather legalistic manner. The Chairman thought it would be useful for our delegations at future Assemblies to be informed when particular policies followed by Canada were inconsistent with our general interpretation of the Charter. Mr. Erichsen-Brown suggested that a list of precedents should be included in the individual Commentary articles.

QUESTION 11. We have adopted a voting practice of abstaining on proposals we dislike which are advanced by our Western friends and of abstaining on proposals we like which are advanced by unfriendly states. Is this voting practice consistent with our long-term interests? Or should we rather accept the idea of voting according to the strict merits of each proposal, regardless of what country sponsors it? Are we justly criticized for abstaining too much?

The meeting noted the fact that at the recent General Assembly the two member states which abstained least were the two dominant ones, i.e. the United States and the U.S.S.R. It was explained that many of the Canadian abstentions at the Sixth Assembly resulted from insufficient time being allowed for the Minister to obtain Cabinet decisions, e.g. the newsprint and wheat questions. When only a few days were available for deciding Canada's position, it was generally not possible to go beyond the opinion of the government department primarily concerned and this usually meant that the immediate Canadian interest was stressed to the detriment of the international aspects of problems which this department might have brought out for Cabinet consideration, had time been allowed. It was agreed that Canada usually had little freedom of action when the United Kingdom and the United States were agreed, but that we had a greater degree of freedom when these two powers were not in agreement: in the latter situation, however, Canada had usually exercised its freedom by abstaining.

The following questions were not dealt with specifically by the meeting, being left for consideration at appropriate meetings during the week:

QUESTION 5. Should we consider the policy of encouraging divisive forces among the under-developed countries in the hope of breaking up what may prove to be a dangerous political bloc?

QUESTION 6. Should our attitude toward the under-developed countries be in general conciliatory, or in general tough, or in general neither?

QUESTION 7. On the assumption that our general attitude toward under-developed countries is to be conciliatory, which of the following broad approaches should be used? What are their relative advantages? In respect of each, can Canada play a lone hand, or should we move only in step with our usual friends?

(a) Economic assistance (On the paper issued for Meeting II appears a list of sorts of economic assistance which have been proposed. At the present meeting, it would be advisable to discuss the degree of economic assistance which ought to be given, e.g.: to the edge of hurting our defences? Or to the extent of sensibly lowering our living standards?)

(b) Support for nationalist aspirations.

(c) Support of covenants on human rights, and like matters involving acceptance of the worthwhileness of international agreements on such matters.

(d) Political support other than the above. Specifically, what? (Policy on admission of new members might be discussed here.)

(e) Propaganda in the under-developed countries.

(f) Establishment of additional missions in under-developed countries, with corresponding desks in Ottawa.

QUESTION 8. If we decide on substantially increased activity in these fields, should we make something of a fanfare about it this summer in ECOSOC and this fall in the Assembly, or should we let our individual votes and speeches speak for themselves?

QUESTION 9. How far is it wise for us to vote for the adoption of and assist in the execution of measures which appeal to under-developed countries but which we think are (at best) unprofitable and (at worst) vicious exercises? Examples: International Development Fund; Convention on Human Rights; Definition of Self-Government; Status of Women. Quite possibly, this question cannot be answered in a general fashion; it might be better merely to bear it in mind in dealing with more specific questions.

UNITED NATIONS SECRETARIAT PROBLEMS

Present:

Mr. E. Reid, Chairman
Mr. D.M. Johnson
Mr. H.H. Carter
Mr. J.E.G. Hardy
Mr. D. Stansfield
Mr. A.R. Crépault
Mr. F.W. Stone

QUESTION A. 1. Is the "principle of geographic distribution", as applied to the composition of the United Nations staff, consistent with the need for a good permanent staff? (One senior officer of the U.N. Administration told our delegation to the Sixth Assembly that the Secretary General had to have dictatorial powers of dismissal in order to fire efficient employees and replace them with inefficient ones in accordance with the principle of geographic distribution.) If not, is it worth our while to take public issue with this principle?

The Chairman observed that Article 101 (3) of the Charter stated that — “The paramount consideration in the employment of the staff and in the determination of the conditions of service shall be the necessity of securing the highest standards of efficiency, competence, and integrity. Due regard shall be paid to the importance of recruiting the staff on as wide a geographical basis as possible.” Geographical distribution was certainly a secondary consideration. It appeared, however, that emphasis was being placed on geographic distribution, even when this was incompatible with efficiency. Mr. Johnson pointed out that members of delegations and Secretariat officials were unwilling to admit publicly that they were, in fact, incompatible. To say so implied a low level of ability in the candidates from certain countries; it was an extremely touchy subject. The Chairman thought that Canadian delegates, at future sessions when this question might be discussed, could go back to the Charter and remind other delegations that efficiency was the most important criterion.

In the meantime it could usefully be asked how efficient the U.N. staff was now. The sense of the meeting was that it was reasonably efficient but also somewhat top-heavy and generally too large for the job being performed. Mr. Johnson remarked that there were large numbers of staff members attending meetings of the Disarmament Commission, many without apparent reasons for being there. The Chairman thought it might be useful to make enquiries about them. It might also be useful for the delegation in New York to ask the Chairman of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions, or members of that Committee, what they thought about the efficiency of the staff. The internship programme might also give Canada opportunity of obtaining an objective opinion on U.N. staff efficiency. In this connection Messrs. Gow of the Civil Service Commission and Currie of Labour who attended the programme in 1949 and 1951 respectively could be consulted. On the basis of information so obtained we could decide how strong a line it would be appropriate for us to take on the question of efficiency versus geographic distribution.

QUESTIONA. 2. Should Canada, under the present special circumstances of the United Nations staff, show more sympathy towards staff demands for guarantees of security, safeguards against arbitrary action by the Administration, etc.? Should we take into account the fact that demands of this kind, even the apparently reasonable ones, may be put forward with the primary aim of causing staff trouble?

There was some general discussion of this question but no conclusions were reached. It was noted that the Secretary General has now undertaken to increase the proportion of permanencies from approximately 30% to 75% or 80%. When this programme is completed, many of the present difficulties will have ceased to exist.

QUESTIONA. 3. Should we, under all foreseeable circumstances, maintain our attitude of “hands off” towards any questions involving the relations between Canadian members of the United Nations staff and the United Nations Administration?

There were two types of cases in which the Canadian government might be asked to intervene on behalf of Canadian staff members. The first of these was the type of case in which a Canadian had been dismissed or subjected to disciplinary action. The meeting agreed that in cases of this sort our "hands off" attitude should be maintained; adequate appeals machinery existed within the United Nations organization itself. The second type of case was that of a Canadian whose promotion within the organization appeared to have been unduly retarded. The Chairman noted in this connection that many Canadians believed, probably with some justification, that the principle of geographic distribution militated against them in the matter of advancement. It was also considered, by many Canadian staff members, that the fact that Canada did not exert influence on behalf of her nationals, while other countries did, meant that Canadians were in fact being discriminated against. After some discussion it was agreed that cases of this sort were seldom clear-cut and that it would be difficult to alter our policy. It would be better, but perhaps more difficult, to eliminate the possibility of discrimination by persuading other countries not to intervene on behalf of their nationals.

This question also elicited some discussion on the question of communism in the U.N. staff. It was agreed that communism in itself was not a crime on the part of any U.N. staff member, from whatever country he came, and that the activities of officials such as Byron Price, to the extent that they amounted to simple persecution of communists, were highly improper. On the other hand, a good communist would, almost by definition, be violating the Charter and his U.N. oath, i.e. taking orders from another authority. It was agreed, however, that it was extremely difficult to produce proof of this sort of thing. Production of proof would of course be necessary if this were to be used as grounds for dismissal.

QUESTION B. Should Canada, joining the have-not countries (and perhaps bowing to the inevitable), show more sympathy towards future salary demands advanced on behalf of the United Nations staff, even though by Canadian standards they are not justified? Are Canadian standards a valid basis for considering United Nations salary levels? Should we revise our attitude towards the "escalator principle", as applied to the United Nations salaries?

It was agreed that Canadian delegations should continue to emphasize efficiency, economy, and similar ideals, and to oppose salary increases when they were not justified. The meeting agreed that Canadian standards were not a valid criterion, at least for public opposition to salary demands, but considered that other valid criteria were available and could be applied — e.g. salaries for similar employment in the New York area, salaries sufficient to attract and hold qualified personnel.

The Chairman opened the meeting by reading passages from Barbara Ward's book "Policy for the West" in which she develops the thesis that it is quite as important for the countries of the western alliance, in order effectively to contain communism, to spend two or three per cent of their national income to provide economic assistance to under-developed countries, particularly in Asia, as it is to devote some fifteen per cent of it to armaments. The North Atlantic Treaty Organization should lay down its own plans of economic assistance to such countries. Full use should also be made of the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations. Miss Ward suggests that western countries should relate their economic assistance to their anti-depression policies.

Mr. Plumptre commented that two or three per cent of the national income in Canada amounted to about $500,000,000. Assistance of this order of magnitude was not at present within the bounds of practical politics. This amount looked even more unrealistic when considered in terms of the national budget; it represented between ten and twelve per cent of the Government's expenditures for the current year. It was true that in 1946 Canada had made a four-year loan of comparable magnitude to the United Kingdom and smaller loans to a number of other countries, particularly in Western Europe. However, assistance on such a large scale was only possible because of the particular circumstances and state of emotion prevailing immediately after the war, and because of the substantial interest which Canada had in hastening the recovery of its traditional agricultural markets. Mr. Plumptre recognized that the rate of assistance suggested by Miss Ward might seem more practicable at a later date if a reduction in defence expenditures should make anti-recession measures desirable.

Mr. Plumptre thought that Miss Ward's recommendation that economic assistance be provided through NATO would be exceptionally difficult to carry out. Under-developed countries were already very suspicious of the imperialist motives of the western countries. Would not their suspicions be considerably increased if assistance was offered to them by an organization grouping in a military alliance most of the former imperialist powers?

Mr. Ronning said that, in Asia, communism could never be contained by military means; the only method at our disposal was greatly increased economic assistance. To be effective, however, economic assistance must be so designed as to meet the real needs of the people. It must reach the villagers, who form the large majority of the population of Asia, and raise their standards of living by increasing agricultural production. Only thus would the people be prepared to resist the attraction of communism and the pressure of communist leaders in their midst. Mr. Ronning believed that the real needs of the villagers could only be ascertained by scientific surveys conducted by international organizations well equipped for this work. Officials sitting in Ottawa or even in Karachi or New Delhi were not in a position to carry out this field investigation. Finally, Mr. Ronning expressed the view that assistance given by various international organizations and national governments should be better co-ordinated than has been done until now. He thought that the United Nations would be particularly well suited to do the co-ordinating. Mr. Ronning illustrated his ideas by referring to the work done by the rural rehabilitation organization under United States auspices in China as one of the few effective forms of economic assistance.

The Chairman, Mr. Plumptre and Mr. Thurrott, in reply to Mr. Ronning, explained the steps which were being taken to achieve a better co-ordination of economic assistance in Asia and South-East Asia. Groups were being formed in local capitals to enable representatives of Colombo Plan countries, the United States and the United Nations agencies to discuss their plans of assistance with representatives of national planning boards and thereby ensure a satisfactory measure of co-ordination and avoid duplication and waste. While Canada did not possess the necessary facilities to conduct surveys, it did make use of the findings of international organizations, particularly the International Bank and FAO. The Chairman pointed out that although India and Pakistan had embarked upon schemes of industrial development, they had shown increasing appreciation in their plans of the need for rural improvements.

Mr. Scott said that the meeting appeared to assume that the granting of economic assistance represented a desirable and wise policy. He did not believe this had been demonstrated, and was himself not convinced that it was true. He could think of the following types of arguments for Canada helping under-developed countries:

(1) Reasons of politics

(a) Economic assistance would win us friends. Mr. Scott thought that at the present stage this proposition was no more than a wishful assumption which might or might not prove to be true. It was unrealistic to expect gratitude; he doubted for example whether Point-fourism had made the United States more popular in Southern Asia, or would draw South Asian countries closer to our camp.

(b) Economic assistance would help contain communism. Perhaps the grass roots type of assistance previously advocated by Mr. Ronning might have some success in meeting this objective. Mr. Scott doubted, however, that industrialization in its early stages discouraged communism; indeed, he suspected the contrary, both from his reading of history and his own observation.

(2) Economic reasons

(a) Economic assistance of the sort and degree now being proposed would raise the standards of living of local peoples. Mr. Scott said he was prepared to believe this if the economists and sociologists, on the basis of evidence, told him so. So far they had not.

(b) Economic assistance would help ward off depression in Canada. Mr. Scott had no opinion on this.

(3) Humanitarian reasons

Everyone accepted the importance of these reasons.

(4) Reasons of shame

Canada would not want to be found behind other countries in the amount of assistance which it gave.

On the whole, Mr. Scott suggested that while the policy of economic assistance might succeed, and was probably necessary for reasons of domestic politics, it was in fact a gamble. He did not oppose economic assistance. He thought it would do us no harm, but we should realize it might do us no good.

Referring to Mr. Scott's remarks (particularly 1(b)), Mr. Carter said that Soviet communism made a powerful appeal to the politically inexperienced peoples of under-developed countries by holding out the promise of economic and social betterment. The West could only withstand this ideological offensive if it could convince the "have-not" peoples that it was able and willing to commit deeds as well as words to the task of improving their lives. In broad terms, it was a question of the West's lending economic and social assistance in return for political co-operation. The formation of NATO had left many of the more articulate people of the under-developed countries with a feeling of isolation and frustration. It was thus more than ever necessary for the West to show that it had not forgotten their problems.

There was discussion of the relative advantages and disadvantages of providing assistance on a bilateral as opposed to a multilateral basis. Mr. Plumptre said that the Canadian Government definitely favoured the bilateral approach. In effect, the bilateral arrangements made under the Colombo Plan had proved extremely useful both to Canada and to the recipient countries.

Canadian authorities had been continuously in touch with the Pakistani and the Indians in Ottawa, and the two sides had learned to know each other better. These contacts were undoubtedly helping to bridge the gap between the East and the West. Advantages of this kind would be lost if economic assistance were given on a multilateral basis. The multilateral approach, however, had certain advantages which did not obtain under bilateral arrangements. In particular, the under-developed countries were less suspicious of the motives of the donor countries if assistance was given under the auspices of an international organization. Such organizations were also better equipped than national governments to conduct necessary surveys and to co-ordinate assistance from various sources. Mr. Plumptre thought that the ultimate objective might be to find a solution which would combine the advantages of both approaches. He said that this avenue should be carefully explored.

The Chairman personally believed that there would be no insuperable difficulties in setting up an international development agency which would meet the requirements of the recipient countries while protecting the interests of the contributing countries, by using, for instance, such a device as weighted voting.

Mr. Plumptre thought that for the time being the Economic and Social Council should be put to greater use by the Western countries to publicize the amounts and types of assistance that they were already giving. For instance, it might be a good idea if each country submitted an annual report to ECOSOC on its economic assistance activities, as was already being done by the United Nations and the specialized agencies. In this way the Council would have before it at regular intervals a complete picture of the help which under-developed countries were receiving. The Chairman suggested that, as a means of focussing attention both abroad and at home on the total size of Canada's economic assistance contributions, these might be included in the estimates as a single vote.

The Chairman summarized the references made by various speakers to the international channels through which Canada was already providing economic assistance or might provide it in future:

(1) The International Bank

(a) Canada's contribution to the bank's capital;

(b) Capital recently raised by the Bank through a loan floated on the Canadian market.

(2) The Proposed International Finance Corporation (as an annex to the Bank)

The establishment of this agency was originally recommended by a United Nations group of experts in a report on "Measures for the Economic Development of Under-developed countries." The purpose of the agency would be to make equity investments and loans to private undertakings operating in under-developed countries. ECOSOC at its Thirteenth Session recommended that this proposal be examined by the International Bank. The representative of the Bank on the Council had looked upon it with favour. The ECOSOC recommendation had been supported by all Council members belonging to the Bank. The Bank's report will be examined by the Fourteenth Session of ECOSOC in May, 1952.

(3) The Colombo Programme

Canada's contribution under the Colombo Programme was greater proportionately than that of the United States under its "Point Four" Programme in South and South-East Asia. Mr. Plumptre said that in the light of the recent debate in Parliament on economic assistance to under-developed countries, it might be possible to obtain approval for a larger contribution to the Colombo Plan next year. Such an increase would not have been possible this year because a large portion of the money authorized last year could not be spent during the financial year. Mr. Plumptre thought that a first memorandum suggesting an increased contribution might go to the Minister in two or three months' time.

(4) The Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance of the United Nations and Specialized Agencies

(5) The Proposed International Development Fund

The last part of the meeting was devoted to a discussion of the attitude which the Canadian delegation should take at the forthcoming session of ECOSOC on the question of the establishment of an international development fund. Mr. Johnson remarked that Canada had incurred more odium at the General Assembly for its negative attitude towards this proposal than in any other connection. The meeting agreed that Canada's attitude towards this question would be of considerable importance in attempting to convince the under-developed countries of the genuineness of our intentions to assist them.

Mr. Hardy said that the questions before the meeting had been framed in the hope that answers to them might provide a more rational basis for future action and a more effective justification of our past policies. He stressed that only by presenting a frank and positive explanation of our past policies and by being prepared to listen to the proposals of the under-developed countries concerning the international development fund, and fully to express our views on the type of international machinery which eventually might be acceptable to us, would we be successful in promoting true understanding and friendship between us and the under-developed countries. He thought that if we were to repeat the same negative arguments as before or to refuse to co-operate in ECOSOC, the under-developed countries would probably go ahead and produce a plan of their own, which, though containing impracticable and unacceptable features, would eventually be adopted. Such a plan could not be put into effect in the absence of any contributions, but the political damage done in the process of working it out would be very serious indeed. Mr. Hardy suggested that we might agree to participate in the ECOSOC discussions on a conditional basis, stating at the very beginning of the meeting that our participation did not imply any commitment on our part to support the setting up of the international development fund or to contribute to it. The resolution adopted by the Sixth Session of the Assembly already recognized that participation in the framing of the plan did not commit governments to contribute.

The Chairman pointed out that there could not be complete agreement in the meeting on the basic principles raised in the questions before it. It would not be possible, in the little time before the opening of the ECOSOC session, thoroughly to review the Canadian policy towards this problem and to effect any radical change in it. The best procedure that could be followed for the present was:

(a) to consult with the United Kingdom and United States to find out whether their governments intended to take part in the ECOSOC discussion. Mr. Johnson undertook to do this. If the United Kingdom and United States were definitely opposed to taking part there would be no point in Canada's deciding to play an active role;

(b) once we knew of the attitude of the United States and United Kingdom, to consult with the other Canadian departments concerned in order to determine what attitude the Canadian delegation should take.

The meeting agreed to this procedure.

QUESTION 7. On the assumption that the three existing relief agencies of the United Nations (UNICEF, UNRWAPR, and UNKRA) represent one means of offsetting the inroads of Communism in the countries in which they operate, are we prepared to adopt a more sympathetic attitude toward any extension of their activities? Are we prepared to support any future increase in the number of such agencies if this should prove necessary and desirable? Are we prepared to pay the price required by such an extension of activities or increase in number?

In examining this question the meeting paid particular attention to Canadian policies with regard to contributions to UNRWAPR, UNICEF and UNKRA.

At the Chairman's request Mr. Hardy outlined the present position concerning the Department's proposal that Canada make a contribution of $750,000 to UNRWAPR for the year ending June 30, 1952. The Department of Finance had not disagreed with this proposal, but had suggested certain conditions or safeguards which, in effect, would alter the character and lessen the amount of our contribution and would have certain political implications which could not be ignored. These conditions were that:

(a) The Canadian contribution would be directly related to the share assumed by countries (other than the United States, the United Kingdom and France) which have responsibilities and interests in the area comparable to Canada's;

(b) The rate of release and the nature of the Canadian contribution would be subject to agreement between the Canadian Government and the Director-General of the Agency;

(c) Provision for the contribution would be made in the supplementary estimates for 1952-53 rather than in the final supplementary estimates for 1951-52 in order to enable us to maintain "direct control" over the Canadian contribution.

If these conditions were to be applied, the Canadian contribution at the present stage of negotiations would not amount to more than $125,000, and would be released only if the Canadian Government were fully satisfied that the Agency's projects received the full support of the Arab Governments concerned.

Mr. Stansfield said that the Department of Finance had also raised objections to the Department's proposal for a contribution of $500,000 to UNICEF. Contending that UNICEF should cease to exist by the end of 1953, Finance had recommended that our contribution should be reduced this year by $100,000 and further reduced next year, to serve notice of our expectation that UNICEF would cease operations once its present lease on life has expired. Mr. Stansfield thought that by accepting Finance's thesis we would be formulating a new policy and pre-judging our position when UNICEF comes up for review in 1953.

Mr. Tovell stated that our contribution to UNKRA was more than adequate at the present time. Until a couple of months ago, it was the largest single paid-in contribution from any United Nations Member.

The meeting then examined the various principles raised by Finance in connection with our proposed contribution to UNRWAPR. On the question of the tying of the Canadian contribution to those of other countries, it was agreed that the practice was not objectionable insofar as it was intended to ensure that our contribution bore a reasonable relationship to those of other countries and to induce them to contribute. The matching formula used in specific instances, however, should be flexible and should not be so construed as to defeat in part the purposes for which the contribution had been approved by the Cabinet. Mr. Hardy referred to the matching formula used to determine our contribution to the 1952 technical assistance programme of the United Nations, as an illustration of a matching formula which was too rigid. Because the United Kingdom had reduced its contribution by some $868,000, Canada had automatically cut its own contribution by $100,000 even though the under-developed countries themselves had pledged an amount roughly the same as last year. The main purpose of the matching formula here should have been to ensure that the under-developed countries would carry their full share of the burden.

On the question of the Canadian Government's reserving the right to control the rate of release of its contribution, depending on performance by the agency, the meeting agreed that this should not normally be resorted to. There was already sufficient international machinery to ensure that the Canadian contributions would be used for the purposes for which they had been sought. To the extent that standards of performance of the agency were unsatisfactory the agency would expose itself to criticism in the international organ concerned and would lose the confidence and support of Member States. If additional guarantees and safeguards were really necessary they should be worked out on an international basis. Final judgment as to when, how and in what direction an agency should spend its money should not normally be left in the hands of any one government. The Chairman thought that a very strong argument had been advanced against the use of the practice proposed by Finance. He stated that while the practice was generally undesirable there might conceivably be certain circumstances under which we might wish to have recourse to it.

The meeting agreed, in discussing the question of tying Canada's contributions to purchases to be made in Canada, that our position must be consistent and that we must not force commodities on a relief agency in contravention of its approved programme, or when we ourselves were criticizing the part of the programme in which those commodities would be used. It had been suggested, for instance, that our contribution to UNICEF should be made largely in fish oil while at the same time we were urging UNICEF to decrease its relief activities and embark more upon long-range projects. The Department of Finance had rightly pointed out the inconsistency of this suggestion.

Mr. Crépault remarked that lateness in making our contributions had the effect of considerably reducing their political value. It was agreed that every effort should be made in future to obtain approval for Canadian contributions in good time.

The meeting also discussed the question of how we should vote on resolutions approving relief programmes when decisions to contribute to such programmes had not yet been reached. The Chairman said this was a most difficult problem. The Cabinet felt that the oratory of Canadian delegates at international conferences in support of good works resulted in a moral commitment to contribute and thus limited the freedom of action of the government. One solution was to abstain on a resolution, for financial reasons; another one, which was adopted in the case of the Blandford plan, was to vote in favour of the programme while reserving the Canadian position with respect to its financial aspects. Canada had at various times made use of these two solutions but they represented equally uncomfortable positions. The meeting agreed that the most desirable solution was to encourage other delegations to behave responsibly, and attempt to ensure that resolutions were not so worded as to involve us in any moral commitments.

Another proposition which was examined by the meeting was the possibility of creating an international relief fund. This fund might be used to finance the activities of all U.N. relief agencies and to meet emergency relief situations. A parallel consolidated relief fund would be set up in Canada, out of which our annual contributions to the international fund would come. Such a fund would also provide a means whereby a contribution could be made at short notice to some emergency relief project (e.g. earthquake in Ecuador), when, if full political capital was to be gained, speed was of the essence.

QUESTION 3. The General Assembly has decided that there shall be two Covenants on Human Rights, one for civil and political rights and the other for economic, social, and cultural rights. Really favouring neither idea, we have not hitherto been active in the formulation of the covenant. Should we now take a more active and positive part at least in the formulation of the first covenant with a view to making it as unobjectionable as possible from our point of view?

The meeting noted that the Minister of Justice now appeared to be of the opinion that it was inevitable that Canada would eventually have to sign a Covenant on Human Rights. The Chairman took it that this meant that the Minister of Justice now considered it inevitable that Canada would both sign and ratify, but would hope that the evil day might be put off as long as possible. It followed that while we need not hasten, we should nevertheless take a more active part in ensuring that both covenants would be as unobjectionable as possible from our point of view. To this end it might be hoped that we would receive a greater measure of co-operation from the Department of Justice.

The meeting noted that an international covenant was not synonymous with a national Bill of Rights; the existence of an international covenant might in fact make it easier to oppose the introduction of a national one.

QUESTION 4. In view of the importance which under-developed countries attach to a Covenant on Economic and Social Rights, should we maintain our opposition to the drafting of a covenant on these rights?

The Chairman believed that the position now taken by the Minister of Justice applied to both covenants.

QUESTION 5. What are the objectives of the under-developed countries in pressing for a Covenant on Economic and Social Rights? Would our signature to such a covenant mean that we will be faced with even stronger demands from under-developed countries for economic assistance in order that they might be able to live up to their commitments under such a covenant?

Mr. Johnson believed it was the Minister of Justice's view that this was in fact one of the objectives of the under-developed countries, or at any rate that whether it was a conscious objective or not our signature to a covenant on economic and social rights would be followed by increased demands for economic assistance. The meeting agreed that there was perhaps something to this theory.

QUESTION 6. Can and should we sign Covenants on Human Rights by which we assume obligations which we cannot implement because certain of the rights included in the covenants lie outside the jurisdiction of the Federal Government or may not be compatible with the nature of our legal systems (common law and civil code)?

Our view in the past had been that it would be difficult if not impossible to draft at least an economic and social covenant which would be enforceable in a court of law. The Chairman believed that this might actually make it easier for Canada to sign. It was rather like a long-term programme adopted by a political party — a useful statement of objectives which were valid enough, even though it might take a generation or more to reach them.

The Chairman thought it would be useful to resurrect the Inter-departmental Committee on Human Rights as it could be assumed that our delegation of ECOSOC would have to face some of these problems.

It was considered that a decision on the necessity for introducing a federal state clause could be postponed until the covenant was drafted. Mr. Erichsen-Brown said that he himself was not convinced of the need for a federal state clause. Existing laws, federal and provincial, did not appear to conflict with the first 18 articles of the covenant as at present drafted.

Some discussion followed on the question of the obligation, moral or otherwise, on the Federal government to disallow new provincial legislation if it was in conflict with an international covenant to which Canada was a party. In this connection there was an important difference between a federal state clause referring to "legislative jurisdiction" and one referring to "jurisdiction" alone. It was unlikely that we could get the word "legislative" included. There was some discussion of the desirability of making reservations to cover our particular constitutional difficulties, if we were unable to secure the inclusion of a satisfactory federal state clause. No firm conclusions were reached, it being the opinion of the meeting that some of the technicalities involved could best be dealt with by an inter-departmental committee.

I. SECRET SESSIONS

Mr. Johnson asked what was meant by secret sessions and how participants in such sessions could be kept from revealing what went on in them. He pointed out that it would be difficult to release communiqués after each session as most of the time would have to be spent on them. Mr. Reid said that secret diplomacy meant that positions of delegations were kept secret in order that they might be able to retreat from them. He suggested that the Disarmament Commission should go underground and that the Chairman should make a statement that no communiqués or statements would be released until the date of the Commission's first report. He also pointed out that Mr. Hickerson of the United States agreed with Canada on the question of secret sessions and that we were to press the United States' representative on the Commission. It was agreed that Mr. Johnson would see the Minister on this question.

II. PLAN OF WORK OF THE DISARMAMENT COMMISSION

Mr. Johnson suggested that on the plan of work we should wait to see what was proposed by the United States paper. This was agreed to. It was expected that the United States Working Paper would be available in Ottawa on April 3.

It was agreed that a liaison officer should be sought in the Department of National Defence, so that we would be in a position to produce comments on conventional armaments proposals before the Commission. Defence Liaison Division should try to see whether a similar officer could be found in the Defence Research Board for questions of atomic energy control.

III. INSTRUCTIONS TO THE CANADIAN REPRESENTATIVE ON THE DISARMAMENT COMMISSION

Mr. Reid stated that he thought that it would be essential to have instructions prepared for the Canadian representative on the Disarmament Commission, since the Canadian approach differed somewhat from that of the United States on certain points with particular respect to insistence on the majority plan for atomic energy control. This paper should be brief and in very general terms. It should contain the general attitude of the Canadian Government agreed to by the Department of National Defence and by the Minister. For example, the instructions should state that Canada considers that the Disarmament Commission should not be used as a propaganda forum, that proposals other than disarmament and atomic energy control should not be discussed in it and that its public sessions should be kept to a bare minimum. The instructions might perhaps also include Canadian policy on what departures might be made from the General Assembly plan on atomic energy control. Mr. Reid pointed out that these instructions should look forward to agreement which might be reached in 1956 rather than in 1952 since the former date was about the earliest time that a disarmament agreement could be worked out.

Mr. Reid suggested that Mr. George might be given the job of preparing a first draft of the instructions. Mr. Johnson agreed and suggested that Mr. George might come to Ottawa for a week or two in order to prepare them. Mr. Reid said that, in the meantime, Defence Liaison Division should try to find out the nature of the instructions which had been given to the United Kingdom representative on the Disarmament Commission. He thought that this might be useful to us in preparing our own.

It was also agreed that Defence Liaison Division should keep the Department of National Defence fully informed as well as the Defence Research Board.

IV. NEXT MEETING

It was agreed that another meeting should be held after the United States' Working Paper on disclosure and verification had been studied.

I. HOTEL ACCOMMODATION

The Chairman remarked that he assumed we would go on trying to get away from the Biltmore. The Permanent Delegation should be asked once more to canvas other hotels for rates and accommodation available, assuming for this purpose that requirements would be approximately the same as a year and a half ago. Meanwhile it might be worthwhile finding out whether the Minister was still as opposed as ever to the Biltmore. Mr. Moran remarked that the perennial difficulty had been the fact that the Biltmore offered rates so much more attractive than anyone else's, and had even been willing to match the bid of any other hotel which threatened to offer more favourable rates.

II. TRANSPORTATION

The Chairman remarked that the transportation problem for the next session would not be serious, since the meeting place would not be more than a ten minute walk from the delegation's quarters. Surprise was expressed that six cars had been made available in Paris, despite the proximity of the Palais de Chaillot to the Hotel Raphael. Mr. Moran thought we should be very cautious about the number of cars provided; car expense at conferences always raised suspicion in the minds of Treasury Board members. The number of cars should be small. The cars should be pooled; there should be no question of assigning individual cars to Ministers or senior delegates.

III. SUPPLIES

Mr. Crépault said that supplies for the session in Paris had been excellent. He remarked, however, that dictaphones need not be provided, since it had been found that delegation members simply did not use them. There was some discussion about the possible need for another teletype machine for the next Assembly. Mr. Starnes thought that the present equipment should be adequate to handle the traffic in the seventh session of the Assembly, with some increase in staff. The Chairman observed that with the Minister present there [would] be less need for teletypes. Mr. Starnes believed that teletype traffic could be greatly reduced by increased use of the courier service.

IV. CLERICAL PERSONNEL

Mr. Côté said it had been suggested that two stenographers be replaced by two typists on the delegation staff. Mr. Crépault believed that eight stenographers and two typists would be the ideal complement. Mr. Côté said that this could be done for the next Assembly.

V. DATE OF APPOINTMENT OF DELEGATION

Mr. Johnson recalled that Senator Hurtubise had complained that not enough time had been allowed for necessary arrangements before the session.

The Chairman observed that for decades delegations had been appointed late, and that this fact had little or no connection with the date on which recommendations had been made by the Dept. He doubted whether anything could be done about it. Mr. Moran remarked, however, that we could at least give advance notice to members of the Department who were on the list, particularly those at Missions abroad as Cabinet was unlikely to make changes in departmental nominations.

VI. ADVANCE WORK BY SECRETARY

The meeting agreed that it would be desirable for the Secretary of the delegation to report to Ottawa if possible six or eight weeks before the session, in order to assist and co-ordinate the work of the various divisions concerned with administrative arrangements for the Assembly.

VII. PRIVATE CITIZENS AS DELEGATES

Mr. Johnson spoke of the difficulties encountered at the Sixth Session in connection with the appointment of a private citizen (Mrs. R.J. Marshall) as a full delegate who was expected to make statements of government policy which sometimes conflicted with her private views. It was agreed that a memorandum on the difficulties and disadvantages involved in appointments of this sort should be sent to the Minister.

VIII. PARLIAMENTARY "OBSERVERS" OR "ADVISERS"

Mr. Johnson said that one difficulty at the last session lay in the feelings of government party advisers who found themselves in an inferior position to government party delegates. There was also the difficulty of advisers expecting to be called upon for advice; it was sometimes embarrassing when advice had to be rejected by members of the delegation other than cabinet ministers. The meeting agreed that subject to the Minister's concurrence the term "observer" should replace the term "adviser". It would continue to be the practice, of course, to have observers attend the morning delegation meetings, where they would be perfectly free to make any observations they wished. Mr. Moran thought it would be advisable to give parliamentary delegates, alternates, and observers a clear statement of the relative positions and duties of each member of a delegation, so that there would be no possibility of misunderstanding. This could perhaps be done in the letters sent to members of parliament inviting them to be members of a delegation. It might also be desirable to advise members of parliament, without specific duties on the delegation, to concentrate on one or two committees as the best method of obtaining the maximum benefit from their attendance at the session.

IX. STATUS OF CANADIAN PERMANENT REPRESENTATIVE TO THE U.N.

It was agreed that the Canadian Permanent Representative should normally be a full delegate in accordance with the practice followed by other countries, and that this should be recommended to the Minister for the Seventh Session.

X. TITLE OF DELEGATION SECRETARY

It was agreed that the "Secretary General" of the delegation should in future be called the "Secretary", as more accurately describing his duties. Mr. Crépault observed that the only reason for the longer title had been that it evoked more respect from members of the U.N. Secretariat and that this was sometimes an advantage. Mr. Scott suggested "General Secretary".

XI. UNDER-STAFFING OF DELEGATION

It had been suggested by the Minister and by Mr. Lesage that the delegation to the Sixth Session was, if anything, under-staffed. Mr. Johnson said that the staff was largely inexperienced and Mr. Moran remarked that it was a matter of quality rather than of quantity. Miss MacCallum thought there were enough advisers to look after all the committees, but that the experience of the delegates was the important thing. Mr. Johnson did not believe that any more career personnel were needed on delegations.

The Chairman thought there was more work to be done at the end of a session, when there were often fewer staff members available. It was noted, however, that members arriving half way through a session found themselves at a disadvantage.

The meeting agreed with the Chairman's view that when delegates were absent alternates should be accredited as full delegates and, if appropriate, advisers should become alternates.

Mr. Moran asked whether there was any objection to having Foreign Service Officers "complete their training" by being made members of the delegation. It was agreed that there was no objection to this practice, although if such officers were only observers, and particularly if they attended only for short periods, they should not displace effective members of the delegation. In any event, the best method for an officer to acquire training was for him to do a job on the delegation.

XII. ALLOCATION OF MEMBERS TO COMMITTEES

Mr. Johnson said that the allocation proposed by the Department for the Sixth Session had been followed and had proved satisfactory. It was agreed that the Department should have a representative on the Fifth Committee. The suggestion was made that an officer from Ottawa, with some prior knowledge of Fifth Committee subjects, would be the best choice.

XIII. LIAISON WITH OTHER DELEGATIONS

Mr. Johnson said that the suggestion made by the Department had not been carried out. The adviser on each committee had had to be responsible for necessary liaison work, while any plenary session liaison was done on an ad hoc basis. The Chairman suggested that in the first two weeks of a session it might be possible to assign liaison work among members of the delegation.

Mr. Moran referred to a recommendation he had made to the Minister that one Spanish-speaking officer be assigned to the delegation with the sole duty of maintaining close contact with Latin American representatives. This would be particularly valuable to our representatives in Latin America in that it would advance the cause of Latin American-Canadian friendship. It would also prove helpful to the Delegation. The Chairman suggested that a similar liaison officer might be considered for the Arab countries. Mr. Johnson said that the last delegation had not had a great deal of contact with delegations outside the Commonwealth and NATO.

XIV. THE CHIEF OF STAFF

Mr. Johnson said that the memorandum prepared by the Department on the duties of the delegation's Chief of Staff had proved useful. He undertook to revise it before the next session.

XV. PRE-ASSEMBLY TALKS

These had been on a rather smaller scale than on previous occasions, largely because the United States representatives, immediately before the Sixth Session, still had no specific instructions on many issues.

The meeting agreed that Canada could not take the initiative in suggesting broadening the attendance at pre-Assembly discussions which were undertaken by the United States, the United Kingdom and France.

The Chairman believed it would be desirable for us to make up our minds as soon as possible on specific problems which were bound to come up in one form or another at the next Assembly, such as Morocco, and Tunisia or a "deal" on the admission of new members. This would greatly increase the value of any pre-Assembly talks in which we participated. It should be remembered, of course, that we were not committed to support any one else's resolution, simply because in pre-Assembly discussion we had succeeded in having desired changes made in it.

XVI. EDITOR OF THE COMMENTARY

The meeting agreed that the editor should be designated by U.N. Division at as early a date as possible, and in any event some two months before the session.

VII. FORM OF THE COMMENTARY

Mr. Johnson said that the delegation in Paris had considered the commentary a well-prepared and very helpful document.

It was agreed that the practice, followed in 1951, whereby instructions prepared for the ECOSOC delegations, together with their reports, formed the main part of the Commentary for the Assembly delegation in respect of the work of the Second and Third Committees, should again be followed in 1952.

The meeting agreed that in future, efforts need not be made to prepare policy guidance sections of the Commentary until the specific proposals with which the delegation would have to deal were known. This applied particularly to cases where reports of Commissions had not yet been received. In the past, efforts had sometimes been made to prepare papers which covered all possible contingencies. This was wasteful of effort, and it sometimes turned out that the proposals finally made had not been foreseen.

XVIII. SECURITY CLASSIFICATION OF COMMENTARY

The meeting agreed that the Commentary should continue to be graded "secret."

XIV. REPORTING OF DELEGATION

There was some discussion on the question of returning to the practice of sending daily delegation reports. The meeting agreed that the next Commentary should contain an article giving detailed instructions on the question of reporting.

XX. SUBJECT FILES

A memorandum from European Division,<sup>42</sup> submitted before the meeting, suggested that special subject files should be prepared containing the actual texts of resolutions voted on in committees and plenary, showing Canada's position and, as far as possible, the manner in which various states or groups of states had voted. It was pointed out, however, that there should be no serious problem of this sort in New York. The Permanent Delegation's files were always moved to the documents office of the Assembly delegation, and they usually contained, in fairly accessible form, the material desired.

Apparently the suggestion from European Division was to the effect that reference files (by subject according to agenda items) be made, starting from the beginning of U.N. to contain records of all resolutions and votes on that subject. This of course would be a tremendous task, and it appears to have been the feeling of the meeting that it was hardly necessary since the files of the Permanent Delegation were available for reference on past decisions and during the session, the delegation documents room, and also the advisers, keep records of this information for the Assembly then in session. TRUSTEESHIP AND NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES

I. Trusteeship

1. QUESTION POSED. In the United Nations a serious difference of opinion exists between the administering powers and the non-administering majority regarding the role of the U.N. in supervising the evolution of dependent peoples to self-government. This difference of opinion is particularly strong concerning the interpretation of Chapter XI of the Charter dealing with "non-self-governing territories". In regard to Chapters XII and XIII of the Charter (trust territories) the difference of opinion relates rather to the degree of supervision which the Assembly should exercise, than to the right of the Assembly to concern itself with these peoples. None of the administering powers disputes that Article 87 gives the Assembly (and the Trusteeship Council) certain broad powers of supervision in regard to trust territories. The question is how the Assembly should exercise these powers. In the past, Canada has generally supported the view of the administering powers that the Assembly should exercise its functions under Chapters XII and XIII only in a very broad manner, leaving to the Trusteeship Council the detailed supervision of the trust territories. This position is opposed by a considerable number of the non-administering states, probably a majority of the Assembly, who wish the Assembly to intervene on matters of detail. Should Canada maintain the position we have previously adopted regarding the role of the Assembly in trusteeship questions?

The Chairman said that the Charter was quite clear on the relationship between the General Assembly and the Trusteeship Council. Article 85 gave the Assembly general authority over trusteeship agreements. Article 87 clearly put the Trusteeship Council under the authority of the Assembly. The question was whether it was wise for the Assembly to attend to details of the administration of trust territories, or whether the Trusteeship Council should do this. He pointed out that the administering powers had half the votes in the Council, but were outvoted in the Assembly. He thought that the Council was better fitted to discuss questions of detail, while general questions of principle should be decided by the Assembly. It was generally agreed that, while the Assembly was free to discuss all trusteeship questions, Canadian policy should continue to be to support the administering powers in their contention that the Assembly should exercise its powers under Chapters XII and XIII of the Charter in matters of general interest only, and that questions of detail should be left to the Trusteeship Council, where it was possible to reach a greater measure of agreement.

2. QUESTION POSED. Should Canada seek election to the Trusteeship Council in the near future? If so, is there any likelihood of our being elected?

It was generally agreed that Canada should not seek election to the Trusteeship Council. The Chairman said that if Canada were to become more active in trusteeship questions, this activity should be increased gradually and should not start with Canada's suddenly seeking election to the Trusteeship Council. Mr. Carter said that Canada had, in any case, very little chance of election since the United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand were permanent members of the Council.

II. Non-Self-Governing Territories

3. QUESTION POSED. In the past, Canadian representatives have stressed that the Charter makes a clear distinction between trust and non-self-governing territories and that the Assembly has a much more limited function in regard to the latter (under Chapter XI) than it has concerning the former (under Chapters XII and XIII). There is a constant drive at the Assembly by the non-administering majority to assert the doctrine of "international accountability" in regard to both types of dependent territories. This drive has taken the form of trying to blur the distinction between Chapter XI, and Chapters XII & XIII. In particular, the non-administering powers have pressed the argument that the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories should discuss political information from the territories concerned. In the past, Canada has tended to oppose this argument and has adhered to the text of Article 73 (e), which does not mention the submission of political information. Should we continue to maintain this position? (It should be noted that Article 10 gives extremely broad powers of discussion to the Assembly. Article 73 (a) also mentions the responsibilities of the administering powers in furthering the political advancement of the peoples of the non-self-governing territories.)

On the legal question of whether the General Assembly could discuss political questions in non-self-governing territories, Mr. Erichsen-Brown observed that the opening words of Article 73 are "members of the United Nations which have ..... responsibilities ..... etc." The article might well be construed restrictively in favour of a colonial power upon the basis that it detracted from its rights which existed at the date the Charter came into force and which were founded on the principle that the colonies were within its domestic jurisdiction. The Chairman admitted that such would be the normal interpretation of a treaty. However, Mr. St. Laurent had said, when he was Secretary of State for External Affairs, that Canadian practice should be to support a broad construction of the Charter where it extended the powers of the United Nations, and a narrow construction of the Charter where it limited the powers of the United Nations. Mr. Erichsen-Brown pointed out that on the other hand, Article 73 referred to a "sacred trust"; a trust implied that an accounting for the trust must be made to some authority, if the principles of common law were to be applied. The Chairman pointed out that the discussion of any question within the scope of the Charter was permitted to the General Assembly by Article 10. Under Article 14, the Assembly was given power to recommend measures for the peaceful adjustment of any situation, regardless of origin, which it deemed likely to impair the general welfare or friendly relations between nations. These provisions apparently gave the Assembly the power to discuss any question it chose dealing with non-self-governing territories. However, it might be necessary to place an item on the agenda in order to allow for such discussion, apart from the submission of non-political information under Article 73 (e). Mr. Johnson said that if Canada was prepared to support this general view, or the inclusion of any item on the agenda relating to political conditions in a non-self-governing territory, we should tell our friends that we were intending to take this line. He wondered how the Assembly could get information on such political conditions as there was no obligation on the administering powers to supply it. He feared that we might get on the slippery slope to the international accountability of the administering powers for political conditions in their territories. In any case, he thought it would be difficult to hold discussions on questions about which the Assembly had not been supplied with facts. The Chairman said that there were precedents for discussion under Articles 10 and 14 of questions alleged to be within domestic jurisdiction. Miss MacCallum said that it would be inconsistent if such questions could be brought before the Assembly, and not colonial questions. Mr. St. Laurent had said at San Francisco that wherever human rights were imperilled, the Assembly would have the right to discuss the situation.

It was agreed that the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories (under Article 73 (e)) was not entitled to ask for information on political conditions, unless such information was voluntarily submitted by an administering power.

The Chairman suggested, and it was agreed, that it would be helpful if the Legal Division would prepare a paper which went thoroughly into the questions which had been raised under this heading.

The Chairman said, and it was agreed, that Canada should support the right of the Assembly to discuss political questions coming up under Articles 73, 10 and 14. This should not, however, prevent us from saying that it was not the proper time for discussion of such questions and from voting against their inclusion on the agenda of a Session of the Assembly.

4. QUESTION POSED. Should Canada seek election to the Committee on Information transmitted under Article 73 (e)?

Mr. Carter said that, while it was unlikely that we would ever be elected to the Committee on Information, we should not completely dismiss the possibility, as the membership of the Committee was larger than that of the Trusteeship Council. Three members of the Commonwealth were permanent members of the Committee: the United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand. Mr. Ritchie thought that Cabinet was unlikely to approve Canada's seeking membership. The Chairman said that Canada should probably not seek election to the Committee at least for some years, and it was so agreed.

III. Canada's Role

5. QUESTION POSED. In general should we attempt to play a more active role in trying to reconcile the views of the administering and non-administering states?

Mr. Ritchie asked what was meant by "a more active role". Did this mean a change in Canadian policy to the disadvantage of the administering powers, or merely more activity by the Delegation to bring the two sides nearer to agreement — the "honest broker" role?

It was pointed out that any further activity in these questions might result in Canada's losing friendship on both sides. Mr. Ritchie said that it should first be proven that greater activity would, in fact, serve a useful purpose. Mr. Johnson pointed out that an unfortunate precedent had been set by representatives walking out on debates in the Fourth Committee.

The meeting discussed the nature of the anti-colonial bloc. Mr. Carter said that Cuba, the Philippines and Egypt had been among the most extreme at the fifth Session. Mr. Scott suggested three possible motives actuating the non-administering majority. Some powers genuinely disliked imperialism and colonialism and wished to see them ended; some wished to embarrass the administering powers for ulterior political reasons; and some used the debates to help maintain leadership in their regional group, or to make political capital for the government of the day at home. He thought we might influence countries in the first category, such as India, but it would be difficult to find ways of influencing the others, whose reasons for opposition to the administering powers were not based on the merits of the issues. Mr. Carter thought that there was a sizeable group in the Fourth Committee which would listen to Canada. The Canadian representative in 1950 had been able to influence the more moderate Latin-American delegations on several occasions. The Chairman suggested that there were a few responsible "neutrals" with whom we might join; he suggested that the only ones besides Canada were the Scandinavian countries, Greece and Turkey. Some others such as India, Brazil and Chile might be responsive to the approaches of this group, acting as honest brokers. Such a group might exercise a stabilizing influence.

Mr. Ritchie said that Canada's freedom as an honest broker was limited by our NATO commitments. The military aspects of any action had to be considered. The Chairman suggested that the Minister might be asked if he would raise the whole question with Mr. Lange of Norway. Norway and Canada were both members of NATO and both non-administering powers. The Minister might ask Mr. Lange what he thought could be done before and during the Seventh Session of the Assembly to improve the atmosphere in the Fourth Committee. An approach might also be made to the Latin-American countries well before the opening of the Assembly to see whether the governments would not give instructions to their delegations which would result in a more reasoned approach to the problems of the administering powers. Mr. Carter suggested that Denmark's foreign minister might also be approached, as well as Mr. Lange, in view of Denmark's greater experience in this field.

The Chairman said that Africa south of the Sahara was the main area in which there were problems connected with dependency. Canada's interest was to prevent an explosion in Africa. A strong call could be made for trying to convince the administering powers that they should look forward to self-government for the African territories within forty or fifty years, if the explosive situation was to be contained.

Mr. Ritchie agreed that a case had been made out for increased Canadian activity in questions of dependent territories. He favoured, however, tactics of informal approaches to delegations in order to bring a measure of agreement, rather than a firm approach based on a policy change. Mr. Ronning said Canada abstained too much, and should take sides. Mr. Ritchie said that such action went beyond the role of honest broker, which often implied abstention in order to preserve the Canadian position for future efforts to bring agreement. Mr. Carter suggested that Canada could preserve the honest broker role by submitting some resolutions which we could support, rather than by leaving the initiatives to the extremists of both sides.

Mr. Johnson said that in the past Canada had generally voted with the administering powers. A change of policy would be likely to bring collisions with them, and particularly with France. Mr. Ritchie said that while French behaviour in Indo-China had been ill-advised, Canada had an interest on military grounds in trying to keep them from withdrawing entirely from that area. Canada could no longer take an entirely objective view.

The Chairman asked that the specific problems in this field which might arise at the Seventh Session should be put before a subsequent meeting for discussion.

IV. South-West Africa

1. QUESTION POSED. Should we continue being critical of South Africa until it accepts the minimal obligations which the International Court of Justice found still exist?

The Chairman thought that Canada should continue its present policy. He said that it was clear that the attacks on South Africa would be intensified at the next Session of the Assembly. Mr. Johnson said that South Africa's threat to withdraw had resulted in a mild debate in final plenary session on the question. He thought that the Latin American countries wanted to keep South Africa in the United Nations where they were free to attack.

2. QUESTION POSED. If South Africa threatens to withdraw partially as at the last session or wholly from the United Nations, should we modify our policy?

Mr. Johnson said that it would be harder to influence South Africa if it were not in the United Nations. The Chairman said that it would be better if South Africa were made to realize that it had the support of not one of the respectable powers. He wondered what the effect of the Canadian vote in favour of the "regretting" resolution had been in South Africa. Mr. Ronning said that the South Africans had said they were "rudely shocked" by Canadian action. The Assembly resolution had resulted, according to reports, in a loss of internal support by Malan. There was general agreement that it would not be wise to drive South Africa out of the United Nations. It was suggested that, it might be our policy to have an "open door" on membership in the United Nations — all countries could be free to enter and leave as they wished. The Charter provisions on admission and expulsion might then become dead letters.

3. QUESTION POSED. In view of the Department's legal opinion, should we vote for any future resolutions of the Fourth Committee to hear the Rev. Michael Scott?

The Chairman said that the opinion of the Legal Division had, in his view, established that the Fourth Committee was within its rights in inviting the Rev. Michael Scott and the Herero chiefs to appear before it. Mr. Johnson said that the Rev. Mr. Scott had made a good impression.

V. Treatment of Indians in South Africa

Miss Ireland said that Canada had always abstained, and had never voted for or against resolutions on this question, since we had wanted an opinion from the International Court of Justice on whether or not the problem was within South Africa's domestic jurisdiction. The South Africans were willing to negotiate, but not under the Assembly resolution, since they did not recognize the authority of the Assembly. India, on the other hand, was unlikely to accept the offer to negotiate on these terms, since it wanted action under the terms of the Assembly's resolution. Miss MacCallum said that many countries had minority problems and were not anxious to see a precedent set for fear that the United Nations might discuss their own internal problems.

The Chairman asked whether the question of Indians in South Africa was still symbolic of the scorn of white races for coloured races, as it had been in 1946. Miss MacCallum said that the discussion had been on a more rational level, and speeches had been notably more conciliatory, probably as a result of the South African withdrawal.

The Chairman said that if, as Mr. Erichsen-Brown thought, neither side wanted a reference to the Court, it would be increasingly difficult for Canada to pursue its past policy. He wondered whether we might not bring forward the resolution on a reference to the Court which had been prepared in the Department during the last session. He suggested, and it was agreed, that a revised resolution might be prepared which Canada could submit regardless of whether the two parties favoured it. The Chairman also suggested that the Canadian High Commissioners in New Delhi and Pretoria might be asked to learn the probable reaction of the Indian and South African governments to a reference of the question to the International Court of Justice.

I. Canadian Interest in the Middle East

The Chairman began by raising the question of what constitutes Canada's minimum interest in the Middle East. He said that the North Atlantic Alliance needed the acquiescence of local populations in Middle Eastern and North African areas if strategic bases were to be maintained for the period of the cold war. This was our minimum interest in the area. The Middle East and North Africa, next to Europe itself were of the greatest strategic interest to the West.

II. Need for greater comprehension of Middle Eastern problems by members of Canadian delegations to sessions of the General Assembly

Miss MacCallum said that many of the members of Canadian delegations to successive sessions of the General Assembly had been frankly at a loss to understand what was going on in the Middle East or the reasons why Arab representatives in various committees of the Assembly were so often opposed to policies supported by Canada. If our policies are to be based on comprehension of Middle Eastern problems it would be worth while to make some provision in advance to give the necessary guidance to the Canadian delegation to the next session of the General Assembly. The problem was two-fold, being related (a) to the comparative lack in Canada of reliable and objectively written information about the recent history and present problems of the Middle East and (b) to the scarcity of personnel in the Department possessing special training or experience in dealing with Middle Eastern problems. A tendency to criticize Arab and Asian delegations without making the effort to understand their position might hamper efforts to prevent the consolidation of an Arab-Asian bloc antipathetic toward the West.

Mr. Johnson agreed with this analysis. He said that the Delegation knew little about Middle Eastern questions, and that experience at the recent Assembly showed the advantages of having an expert on the Middle East on the Delegation which has made helpful Canadian intervention in the Palestine question possible.

III. Measures which the Department might take to increase understanding of Middle Eastern problems

(1) Middle Eastern Expert on the Canadian Delegation

Miss MacCallum suggested that a senior officer be appointed to the Delegation who would be assigned well in advance the responsibility for steering into helpful channels all discussions in the Delegation of the policies of Middle Eastern representatives in various committees of the Assembly. The Chairman said that this would mean increasing the Delegation by two officers, one of whom would keep in touch with Latin American delegations and the other with Asian and African delegations. This was particularly necessary because our representation in these areas was inadequate. He agreed that these officers should be experts who should make preparations well in advance for their special duties with the Delegation.

(2) Middle Eastern Expert at Canada House

Miss MacCallum suggested that if it was still impossible to consider the establishment of Canadian missions in the Middle East, a first step toward increasing the flow of information on Middle Eastern developments might be the appointment to Canada House of a qualified officer to specialize in Middle Eastern affairs. Sources from which information might be drawn would include the Foreign Office, the diplomatic missions of the Middle Eastern countries which send some of their best men to London, and the confidential files on Middle Eastern material at Chatham House. Supplementary material might be derived from occasional studies made in Paris. In New York or Washington it might be more difficult to procure information of the sort required. The Chairman said that an officer operating at Canada House might also be the expert sent to meetings of the General Assembly. For the time being, this might be the most economical way of increasing our information on the Middle East. Mr. Scott said that it was important that the officer should be a well informed person, having a good working knowledge of the history and contemporary problems of the area. Mr. Norman thought it would be an advantage if the officer concerned could speak the languages of the Middle East. Mr. Ritchie warned against any form of accreditation for such an officer. It would be necessary to avoid getting into an ambiguous position with Middle Eastern missions in London, which should not be officially informed that the officer in question was working solely on Middle Eastern questions. The appointment of such an officer would be a stop-gap measure only. One officer would be doing work of two missions. The Chairman said that a memorandum for the Minister should be prepared along the above lines and that it should be discussed with Mr. Moran and the Personnel Division. Mr. Moran said that he would discuss the proposal with Mr. Robertson.

(3) Rotation of Officers on Middle Eastern Desk in the Department

Miss MacCallum suggested that a further measure to ensure that Canadian policies should be based on adequate comprehension of Middle Eastern problems would be to arrange for rotation among officers of the Department of the responsibility for dealing with incoming material on the Middle East. The tendency to regard the Middle East as the preserve of a single expert should be avoided. If more officers became conversant with Middle Eastern problems through two or three-year periods of duty at the area desk the advantages to the Department would be obvious. The experiment had already been tried for a 10-month period with very successful results. The Chairman said that this should be suggested to the Personnel Division. Officers returning from Pakistan or Turkey might spend some time in the European Division working on Middle Eastern affairs if the Head of the Division considered this to be suitable. Mr. Watkins said this would depend on the qualifications of the individual officers concerned.

IV. Discussion of the Moroccan Question in NATO

The Chairman said that NATO had an important interest in preventing unrest in this area.

Mr. Ritchie said that if Canada should propose in NATO that there should be some international accountability for Middle Eastern and North African territories, it would be unlikely that agreement could be reached or even that discussion could be brought on.

The view was, however, expressed to him that Egypt, Indo-China, Sweden and Switzerland had already been discussed in the North Atlantic Council, and that, it might be possible to influence the French to some degree in NATO. Mr. Wershof said that the United Kingdom Chiefs of Staff thought that the French might propose that the NATO area should be extended to include all of French North Africa. The United Kingdom Chiefs of Staff did not think this a good idea.

It was pointed out that there are already bases in Morocco that would be used by NATO in the event of an emergency. It was suggested that the question of extending the area of NATO was for the United Kingdom, France and the United States to decide. The area was not of interest to all members of NATO since some did not wish to be committed to defend those areas.

Mr. Ritchie thought that NATO could not go on indefinitely without discussing the political problems of Middle Eastern stability, since these affected the defence position of France and the United Kingdom. He doubted, whether Canada should take the initiative since a proposal to discuss the problems of this area might involve us in commitments in the area. The Chairman suggested that pre-Assembly talks in NATO might be held on items of interest to NATO (such as Morocco) to see what could be done to prevent too great embarrassment of individual members of NATO. Mr. Ritchie warned that bad feeling in Asia and the Middle East might be aroused by what appeared to be an attempt by the colonial powers in NATO to "influence" discussion in the General Assembly beforehand.

The Chairman said that the problem of the French in Morocco was similar to that of the problem of the United States in Korea. The Canadian Government has to discover how best to influence each ally by finding the most effective and least annoying channel. Mr. Ritchie commented that the French can argue that Morocco and Tunisia are their possessions and their responsibilities.

V. Methods of Obtaining Co-operation from Middle Eastern Countries

Miss MacCallum said that if NATO powers wished to encourage a mutually co-operative spirit within the Middle Eastern area on which they plan to base part of their defence it would be an advantage to establish the habit of approaching the representatives of Middle Eastern countries with greater tact. For example, the invitation to Egypt to join in a Middle Eastern defence system had been so worded as to alienate rather than encourage the co-operation of all Arab countries. Although opportunities had been offered earlier by Arab statesmen themselves to work out a plan for international defence of the Suez Canal zone, these opportunities had been ignored by Western powers, whose present proposals looking toward Middle Eastern defence were put forward as a statement of intention to be pushed through whether the Arabs liked it or not. Mr. Ritchie said that eventually such matters as these should be discussed in the Council of NATO and policy should be agreed on before acts were done which affected all members. For example, it would have been helpful if the French had told NATO beforehand what they intended to do in Tunisia before the government there had been deposed. The Chairman pointed out that Canada was not yet in a position to propose this sort of thing.

The Chairman asked whether Pakistan exercised a moderating influence in the area. Miss MacCallum said that it did. Mr. Johnson gave instances of where Pakistan had tried to help.

VI. The Moroccan Question and the Agenda of the General Assembly

The Chairman said that this problem could arise again at the next Assembly. Despite our efforts to delay a decision on this question our hands were free to vote in favour of its inclusion. We could merely say that the time was now more suitable to discuss the question, than it had been at the Sixth Session. He said that if the present situation continued through the next six months, we would have no valid excuse in trying to keep it off. Indonesia constituted a precedent; in this instance, unrest in a colonial territory threatened peace and security, and the question was placed upon the agenda.

Mr. Ritchie said that it was possible that the coming summer and autumn would be a particularly difficult and perhaps critical time for France. The cumulative strain of the war in Indo-China, the political and fiscal instability within the country and the great demands being made on France to raise French divisions this year would impose a severe test on French strength and morale. It would be particularly unfortunate if French colonial policy were to be subjected to a campaign of public denunciations from the platform of the United Nations. While it might be impossible to prevent the inclusion of an item dealing with French North Africa on the agenda of the General Assembly, it was to be hoped that a special session on Tunisia could be avoided. Mr. Wershof said that Canada owed a loyalty to its allies and that this loyalty might prevent Canada from voting as a completely free agent in the United Nations. This was especially true when the question of an area like Morocco arose, where defence activities were going on. He said that he thought that the French would feel that they could demand more friendship from us by virtue of their association with us in NATO. To assume that the colonial age is doomed and that it is necessary to urge making terms with local rulers while there is still time, is not in accordance with friendship in an alliance. The Chairman said that Canadian interest was in the strength of the alliance as a whole, that if any French policy led to a decrease in that strength Canada should oppose that policy while at the same time maintaining an interest in the stability of France. It was necessary to balance the stability of France as an ally against the interests of the alliance as a whole. The Chairman said that other countries in the alliance should have some influence in the policies of a single member in the interests of the whole alliance. He said that while we may not wish to give Morocco self-government we do need bases in Morocco and we do have a stake in the area. It would be difficult to maintain this stake in the face of a hostile population — it was therefore necessary to make a deal of some kind. Mr. Ritchie pointed out that it would be very unfortunate if the French became suspicious of the motives of any of their allies over North African questions. There had always been a suspicion in France that it was the British who had extruded them from Syria and the Lebanon. They might also suspect that there were certain American commercial interests in North Africa. The United States already had bases there. Miss MacCallum said that when the United Kingdom moved out of spheres of influence in the Middle Eastern areas the United States had been the beneficiary in some cases. Miss MacCallum said that Greece was an example of the most extensive United States control of a sphere of influence which had been vacated. This trend had also taken place to some extent in Turkey.

VII. The Dispute between Israel and the Arabs

The Chairman said that the Canadian Delegation had taken an active part in securing a resolution on this subject at the recent session of the General Assembly. He asked for a statement of what Canada's policy in this connection was considered to be. Miss MacCallum said that the part played by Canada in securing an Assembly recommendation in November 1947 in favour of the partition of Palestine had implied active Canadian support for the principle of setting up an independent Jewish state in the Middle East. Since 1947 it has been necessary for the Security Council and the General Assembly to follow through to ensure the satisfactory adjustment of the peoples of the Middle East to the changed situation. Canada as a member of the United Nations had been concerned with the success of United Nations efforts to stabilize international peace and security in the area. During the Sixth Session of the General Assembly there had developed a threat of the immediate breakdown of United Nations activities through the Palestine Conciliation Commission and the Relief and Works Agency. A breakdown of this nature would have caused a serious deterioration of international relations in the area. The Canadian Delegation helped Dr. Jessup of the United States Delegation to transform this threat into a reaffirmation by overwhelming majorities of the principle of continued United Nations efforts to secure a satisfactory settlement of issues outstanding between Israel and the Arab states and continued practical aid for Palestine refugees.

The advantage gained by these Assembly resolutions was not in danger of being lost for lack of active follow-up by the Conciliation Commission. Moreover, openings offered by both sides during the debate, which might have been exploited to good effect by an able conciliator, had been allowed to pass unheeded by the United Nations. If Canadian interest in the success of United Nations peace efforts in the area was lively enough, Canada might now try to persuade the three powers making up the Conciliation Commission to appoint to that body persons of proved ability as conciliators to get on with the job actively. Miss MacCallum did not suppose it was Canada's function to take the initiative in working out the basis of what might be considered a reasonable peace settlement, although in order to break through the circle of apathy which was impeding a settlement it would be an advantage if someone were to make an effort of this nature. The Chairman suggested that it might be well to put up to the Minister the question of the part Canada should play between sessions of the General Assembly in order to prevent gains made during the sessions themselves from being frittered away.

VIII. The Blandford Plan for Assistance to Palestine Refugees

(At Meeting II, the principles of Canadian contributions to relief agencies were discussed.)

The Chairman said that it could be assumed that Canada, as a member of the United Nations, would contribute to UNRWAPR. It was now a question of the size of our future contribution. Mr. Scott asked how important a contribution was in the view of the European Division. Miss MacCallum said that the purpose of the Blandford Plan was to enable a large proportion of the refugees to shift for themselves instead of continuing to be dependent on international aid. It might be a while yet before Israel and its Arab neighbours worked out either a boundary agreement (which would determine whether the former homes of some thousands of refugees would be under Arab domination or not) or an agreement as to what categories of Arab refugees might resettle in Israel. The working out of such agreements was the business of the Palestine Conciliation Commission. It was not the function of the Relief and Works Agency. The task set for the latter under the Blandford Plan was to rehabilitate the refugees by providing opportunities for their present settlement in Arab countries, without prejudice to their repatriation if and when the opportunity arises for returning to their former homes. The Arab governments, which have reason to fear the growing discontent of concentrated masses of refugees, are anxious to take advantage of the Blandford plan for the dispersion of the refugees in self-supporting communities. They fear equally, however, the public outcry that would be raised if Arab representatives at the United Nations could be accused of joining in a general conspiracy to defraud the refugees of their right to repatriation by forcing them to settle permanently outside of Israel. The Blandford formula of rehabilitation through creation of self-supporting refugee communities, without prejudice to repatriation, seems to afford the only practical means of escape from the present dilemma, which has been created by the determination of the refugees to return to their former homes and the determination of Israel to exclude them. Whereas at the Fifth Session of the General Assembly there was a feeling that the refugees would have to accept their permanent exclusion from Israel, during the Sixth Session a trend had developed in favour of the view that there are categories of refugees which Israel ought to accept and that it should not delay indefinitely the payment of compensation and the release of frozen funds of Arab refugees in Israeli banks, which would make it possible for many of the refugees to set themselves up in business once more.

The Chairman asked whether the compensation to be paid to Israel by Germany might assist Israel in compensating Arab refugees. Miss MacCallum replied that the Foreign Minister of Israel had said the two matters were not unrelated. She added, however, that Israel was experiencing a serious economic crisis and urgently needed for itself any compensation Germany might pay. She had wondered whether Israel might not find it preferable to arrange for a long-term loan in order to meet the obligations it has acknowledged for compensation of Arab refugees. Repayment of the loan could be made more easily when the peak of immigration to Israel has been passed. Quite a number of the Arab refugees need only to have their private capital restored in order to resume normal life outside Israel. The Chairman asked that a memorandum on UNRWAPR should be prepared for the consideration of the Minister.

FAR EASTERN QUESTIONS

Present:

Mr. E. Reid, Chairman
Mr. D. Johnson
Mr. R.A. MacKay
Mr. E.H. Norman
Mr. M. Scott
Mr. F.B. Rogers
Mr. H.H. Carter
Mr. F. Tovell
Mr. G. Grande
Mr. D. Stansfield
Mr. C.F.W. Hooper

QUESTION 1. The western powers have worked on the assumption that the post-armistice conference to which the General Assembly is being asked to give its blessing at the Special Session will confine itself to Korean questions and will not touch related Far Eastern problems such as the future of Formosa, recognition of the Central People's Government of China, Chinese representation in the United Nations, and economic relations with China. Do we continue to support this assumption and would we oppose any Arab or Asian or other attempt to widen the scope of the Conference?

The Chairman said that the western powers would propose that the Special Session confine itself to Korean questions. This would be approved unless some power or group of powers decided to be difficult. Mr. Johnson said that the French had thought that a special session would have a slightly better chance of keeping other questions off the agenda. Trygve Lie had thought that the important thing was that Padilla Nervo should not be chairman; although our own reports had been favourable enough, the Secretary General had found him weak and unwilling to take initiative of any kind.

The Chairman said that whether at a special session or the next regular session, a draft resolution would be put up and it would provide for discussion only of other related Korean questions. This constituted a withdrawal from the United Nations position of a year ago which was that other related Far Eastern questions would be discussed.

The meeting agreed that in an election year it would be impossible for the Americans to agree to discuss anything more than this. We would be obliged to support the Americans. We could argue with any Asians who chose to be difficult that the Korean question must of course be solved before anything else could be discussed. At the same time it might be possible to persuade the United States to make concessions of form but not of substance, which might go part way to meeting Asian objections.

QUESTION 2. What should be the role of the General Assembly and the Security Council in a Korean settlement? Should the General Assembly try to do more than give its blessing to a conference composed as the United States suggests? (The United States' view is that the role of the Security Council should be simply to pass a resolution referring the question to the General Assembly.)

Mr. Rogers wondered whether the Security Council resolution was necessary; the Assembly could deal with the subject without one. The Chairman agreed that this was true and that the possibility of a Soviet veto in the Security Council introduced an element of danger. The United States plan at the moment, however, was to show the resolution privately to the Soviet representative beforehand. If the indications were that he was going to veto, some other procedure could be tried. The essence of the question was that the Security Council should approve a resolution which had been negotiated beforehand in secret with the Soviet Union. The meeting agreed that this was the best way of dealing with the question.

QUESTION 3. Do we have any views about the composition which the United States has suggested for the conference? This is Australia, Colombia, France, Siam, Turkey, the United Kingdom, the United States, the Central People's Government of China, the North Korean authorities, and possibly the Soviet Union.

There was some discussion of this question, with particular reference to the differentiation between the Soviet Union and the "American satellites". Canada had already expressed concern over the inclusion of some of the countries suggested. It was agreed that there was not much more that we could do, other than to continue, as in the past, to press for the inclusion of India.

QUESTION 4. Would we be prepared to campaign at the Assembly to keep the instruction for the United Nations states at the conference to seek a unified, independent and democratic Korea, hortatory rather than mandatory?

Mr. Rogers remarked that the conference, under the draft resolution, would be told to seek a unified, independent, and democratic Korea, but it was not instructed that it could negotiate on no other basis. Nevertheless, a unified, independent and democratic Korea remained the declared United Nations goal. The Chairman said that it would be helpful if we could find out whether the Americans really wanted a unified, independent and democratic Korea. It could be argued that the attainment of this goal would hasten the date at which the whole of Korea would be governed by the Communists and that this might be a good thing since it would cut commitments in that area early and neatly. Perhaps what the Americans really wanted was the restoration of the status quo ante bellum with the boundaries moved to the armistice line. The danger was, however, that the Russians might come forward with a reasonable proposal for achieving the professed United Nations aim. What would happen then? Mr. MacKay suggested that perhaps the Americans themselves had not really made up their minds. Mr. Rogers was inclined to agree that they had not reached a clear decision on the subject. The Chairman believed that they had sensed the danger of attaining the objective of a unified Korea but that if they deserted that objective in favour of the restoration of the status quo the Administration would be violently attacked for getting into a war which settled nothing. The meeting thought Mr. Johnson might have some success in extracting an answer from the Americans.

QUESTION 5. Is the course of action as outlined in WA-817, 818, 819, and 822 of March 26 generally acceptable?

The meeting agreed that it was.

QUESTION 6. In the event of a cease-fire leading to a Special Session of the General Assembly are there any matters about Korean relief which Canada should raise at the session?

This question was not considered separately but was kept in mind during the consideration of questions 7 and 8, which were taken together.

QUESTION 7. UNKRA's terms of reference (General Assembly Resolution 410V) imply that UNKRA should extend its activities to North Korea. A resolution which the State Department has drafted for the Special Session of the General Assembly would reaffirm the "intention of the United Nations to carry out its program for assistance to the Korean people in the reconstruction and rehabilitation of all of Korea," and would request "the Agent General to be ready to extend his activities throughout Korea as soon as the General Assembly will have approved a political settlement for a unified, independent and democratic Korea." This means that UNKRA would not carry out relief operations in North Korea during the period following a cessation of hostilities but only after approval by the General Assembly of a political settlement. We have already given tentative approval of this draft. Should this approval be reconsidered?

QUESTION 8. Is it our wish that UNKRA do as much work in Korea as it can usefully do as soon as it can do it, or are we content that UNCACK should keep on doing the job as long as it chooses to do so? Specifically, (a) do we wish UNKRA to keep on trying to take over now, or (b) do we wish UNKRA to keep on trying to take over as soon as possible after a cease fire; or (c) are we content to let things take their course without interference from us?

Mr. Tovell said that UNKRA's terms of reference had referred to "Korea" and not to the North or the South separately. These of course had been drafted sometime before December 1950 when the situation in Korea was very different from what it was now. Under the proposed resolution no money would be spent in North Korea until the Assembly had approved a political settlement. The meeting discussed at some length what would happen if the North Koreans sought relief, or if some member of the United Nations wanted to have relief offered to the North before that time. The Chairman observed that a simple amendment to the proposed resolution would make the original terms of reference apply, and thought that we should ask the United States and the United Kingdom what they thought about it. The important political reason for at least offering relief to North Korea, under proper safeguards of course, was that the destruction caused in the North by the United Nations forces had done immense damage to the position of the western powers throughout Asia.

Mr. Norman thought that the Americans would be very reluctant, on military grounds, to offer any relief to North Korea. On the other hand, the reasons which could be given for this attitude were not particularly valid since the Communists could violate the permanent settlement as easily as they could violate an armistice. Mr. Johnson noted that WHO had already offered assistance with the approval of the Unified Command; this might be taken as a precedent. Mr. MacKay said, however, that medical assistance was rather different, since epidemics affected both sides of a battle line. He could not conceive of the Americans agreeing to any substantial assistance for the North.

The Chairman recalled that between the wars there had been criticism of the Allies for not sending relief assistance to the enemy after the armistice and before the peace settlement. In that case, of course, there had been a victory rather than a draw, but there was still a possibility that the Americans, as well as ourselves, would be criticised for not offering assistance. The meeting agreed with a suggestion made by Mr. Scott that the best solution might be to leave the whole paragraph out of the resolution. This would avoid precipitating a demand for relief assistance for North Korea at the Assembly session, and would get us back to the present situation in which the whole question is up to UNCURK to decide in consultation with UNKRA. The Chairman thought that a telegram might be prepared for the Minister's consideration, asking the Embassy in Washington to discuss the question with the State Department, pointing out the dangers involved in using relief as an instrument of policy, i.e. that the Asian-Middle Eastern countries might, from humane motives, introduce an amendment to the resolution, providing for relief to North Korea.

Considerable discussion followed on the questions of UNKRA's present activities, its relations with UNCACK, and the arrangements for the taking over of UNCACK's work by UNKRA in the six months following cessation of hostilities. Mr. Scott said that our objectives were (a) to help the Koreans, (b) to help them in such a way that they would be duly grateful, (c) to ensure that the United Nations got all the credit they deserved and more if possible, and (d) to ensure that Canada got her share of the credit and more if possible. If the financial point of view were alone to be considered we should be happy to leave Korean relief, to the greatest extent possible and for the longest time possible, in the hands of the United States taxpayer, i.e. UNCACK. A difficulty was our inability to get reliable information on exactly what was going on. We did not know whether all or any of our objectives were being achieved. We also did not know why UNCACK appeared to be so determined to carry on.

The Chairman remarked that the six-month arrangement for turning over the functions of UNCACK to UNKRA had a bearing on the question of providing relief for the North Koreans. If UNCACK carried on for six months in the South it was reasonable to assume by analogy that something in the nature of a "Chinese CACK" would do the same thing in the North.

The meeting agreed that the United Nations Division and the American and Far Eastern Division should prepare a memorandum for the Minister, for his information and also to cover the telegram to Washington suggested previously, summarizing our present knowledge of the rather confusing situation with regard to Korean relief.

The question was raised, with reference to a view [which] had been expressed at one time by the American and Far Eastern Division, as to whether it was true that Canada did not favour the reconstruction of Korean industry because the country was expected soon to be in Communist hands. If this were true our representative on the UNKRA advisory committee (Mr. Johnson) should know about it. Mr. Norman thought that the Koreans should be helped to repair the damage done to industry, but not to advance industrially. Mr. MacKay wondered whether the question was really important. The Chairman thought that the importance lay in the criticism which would be leveled at western governments, and particularly at the United States government, when and if Korea were taken over by the Communists, if the West had previously spent a lot of money on industrializing the country. There was the fact, however, that the funds available for Korean reconstruction would inevitably be inadequate. Mr. Rogers thought our attitude might well be spent on short-term projects. The Chairman thought this was a nice way of putting it. The meeting agreed that the initiative should be left with American and Far Eastern and Defence Liaison (1) Divisions to provide an analysis of this problem of the re-industrialization of Korea.

My dear Pearson —

From time to time the idea crops up in the minds of a certain number of people here that we should work towards squeezing the U.S.S.R. out of the United Nations. I have not had an opportunity to discuss even the vague possibilities of this with individuals like yourself. The plus and minus of such action are reasonably apparent. I would be grateful if you would let me know, for my personal and confidential information, what your views are on the subject — and if much thought has been given to this question by the few others whose views would carry weight on such a subject. The fact that there has been, so far as I know, no overt move in this direction, would seem to indicate that at least Britain and America believe that the best interests are served by U.S.S.R. remaining in the United Nations rather than out.

However, if you would care to write to me privately on the subject, I would be most interested.<sup>43</sup>

PERSONAL AND SECRET

Ottawa, June 3, 1952

I was glad to receive your letter of May 20, asking for my views on the question of squeezing the Soviet Union out of the United Nations. It gave me an opportunity to clear my own mind on this very important subject.

In my view, the democracies would be making a serious mistake if they took action in the United Nations which either forced the withdrawal of the Soviet Union from the organization or which gave the U.S.S.R. a convincing propaganda pretext for such a withdrawal. The United Nations still provides unique opportunities for contact between the Cominform states that are members of the United Nations and the free world, and the forced withdrawal of the Soviet Union would only lead to the breaking-off of this contact without in any way altering the present balance of military power in the world. Soviet Russia will still present the same threat to our security whether or not she is a member of the United Nations. Moreover, if the Western democracies act in a manner which forces the Soviet Union (and thus her satellites) to leave the United Nations, this might be followed by the withdrawal of other states, not because they were Communist or pro-Russian, but because they preferred not to belong to any organization which would then have become so markedly anti-Soviet and partisan in the Cold War. This would, of course, further weaken the prestige of the United Nations, especially in Asia where its influence is of great importance to us.

It is true that the presence of the U.S.S.R. in the United Nations is often a great irritation but the withdrawal of the U.S.S.R. would destroy the principle of universality which is basic to the United Nations, without achieving any comparable gain in terms of our security. Indeed, the security position of the West might be even worse if the Soviet Union were forced out of the United Nations, as we might alienate many countries which are not in a position to make military contributions in the event of war with Russia, but whose moral and, perhaps, economic support would be of great value to us.

Furthermore, the United Nations machinery is capable of initiating negotiations of various sorts which, even if they do not succeed in producing solutions to our problems, may assist the free world to gain more time when time is badly needed.

So far as I know both the United Kingdom and United States Governments share the view of this Government that our best interests are served by having the Soviet Union remain in the United Nations rather than by driving it out.

Thanking you again for your letter, I am,

Yours sincerely,

L.B. PEARSON

PRESIDENCIES OF THE UNITED NATIONS GENERAL ASSEMBLY (SEVENTH SESSION), AND ECOSOC (1952)

The President of the General Assembly of the United Nations for the Seventh Regular Session will not be elected until the Session opens later in 1952. Nevertheless, consideration has already been given to the Canadian position, and it is desirable that Heads of Missions should be informed of the present situation.

2. The two most important offices in the United Nations, outside the Secretariat, are the presidency of the General Assembly and the presidency of the Economic and Social Council. The two positions have never been held simultaneously by one member state, nor is it likely that they could be. Canada has never held either post. By convention, the great powers are excluded from the two presidencies.

3. During December, our delegation to the Sixth Session of the General Assembly was asked by the French, United Kingdom and United States delegations whether a Canadian would be available for the presidency of the Economic and Social Council. This election will be held at the beginning of the Fourteenth Session of the Council in New York in May, 1952. The president then elected would hold office through 1952 and into 1953.

4. This enquiry made it necessary, rather earlier than had been expected, to examine our position concerning the presidency of the General Assembly, since the election of a Canadian to the presidency of the Economic and Social Council would militate seriously against the election of a Canadian to the more important post.

5. On December 26, 1951, the delegation in Paris was requested to inform the French, United Kingdom and United States delegations that Mr. Pearson was a serious candidate for the presidency of the General Assembly, and therefore a Canadian would not be available for the presidency of the Economic and Social Council. This information was given confidentially to the three delegations and this confidence was respected. On February 4, the day prior to the conclusion of the Sixth Regular Session, the delegation in Paris was told that it should inform other friendly delegations that Mr. Pearson was a serious candidate and that it should let the French, United Kingdom and United States representatives know that this was being done. The matter is therefore no longer confidential and has indeed already come to the notice of the press. It should be clearly understood, however, that no campaign is being initiated now to gain support for Mr. Pearson's candidacy. It is not desired that you should take any action on this information, though if enquiries are received you may state that Mr. Pearson has indicated that he is willing to serve.

6. If an armistice is concluded in Korea, there will be a special session of the Assembly to deal with Korean matters. The Minister is not a candidate for the presidency of a special session of this kind, but is a candidate for the Seventh Regular Session.

7. The Department should be informed of any reactions to Mr. Pearson's candidacy, as well as any local reports of other candidates and of candidates for the presidency of the Economic and Social Council.

8. Indeed, it may be taken as a general principle that the Department is interested in information about individual candidates for offices in the United Nations, and about candidacies of countries for seats in those United Nations bodies in which vacancies periodically occur.

PRESIDENCY OF SEVENTH GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Reference: Telegram No. 527 of February 6 from the Acting Chairman of Canadian delegation to General Assembly, Paris.†

1. I have been wondering what steps, if any, you would like the delegation to take between now and the next General Assembly to follow up the informal approaches we made to thirty or forty friendly delegations during the closing days of the last General Assembly in Paris informing them that if it was the general wish you would be willing to stand for the Presidency of the next General Assembly.

2. I know that you do not want us to campaign for your election, nor do I think that campaigning would be either appropriate or necessary. With the exception of the usual Soviet Bloc candidate you are, so far as I know at present, the only candidate in the running. I assume that Prince Wan will find it impossible to remain in New York throughout the assembly now that he has become Foreign Minister of Thailand. It is true that Mr. Belaunde of Peru was speaking at the end of the assembly as if he might have ambitions to preside over the next one, but I should not think he would have much chance of immediately succeeding another Latin American, Padilla Nervo. The knowledge that you are willing to be a candidate will deter others from standing.

3. I do not think that we should take your success for granted. No doubt most delegates are favourably disposed towards you personally. However, it is possible that some (i.e. some Arab, Asian and even Latin American delegates) who are suspicious of NATO may think you are too closely associated with NATO, and others (i.e. the under-developed countries) may think that Canada has not been particularly cooperative in economic development matters.

4. In talks which I have had no delegate has indicated that he holds either of the views mentioned in the preceding paragraph. Protitch,<sup>44</sup> however, dropped a hint at lunch one day that perhaps your close NATO association might be held against you by some delegations. My own feeling about this is that your NATO association should help you. It seems to me that those delegations which are suspicious of NATO would be inclined to say that if a leading architect of NATO is willing to spend three or four months of his time exclusively on United Nations matters it is in no sense true to say that the United Nations takes second place in our thinking.

5. I do not want to over-emphasize the possible opposition to your candidacy, but, with these thoughts in mind, I wonder if there might not be a few things we might do in New York in a quiet and informal way which would be helpful to correct any misapprehension which may have arisen that, because of the very prominent part you have been playing in NATO, you are less interested than you used to be in the United Nations.

6. In the first place we might gradually take advantage of what opportunities offer during the next few weeks to find out from those delegations we have already approached in Paris whether they have had any reaction from their governments. Without actually asking them to make a commitment, we might find out, where and when we can, which delegations are likely to vote for you. These approaches might at least equally well be made in the capitals of the countries concerned, but the only advantage in going the rounds here is that we may have opportunities of doing so more informally than an enquiry in the capitals of the countries concerned. As I recall, it was suggested while I was in Ottawa that we may ask some other delegation or delegations to take our soundings for us. I think it would be helpful a little later on if our more influential friends here would let it be known that they are supporting your candidacy, but I am inclined to think it would not be in accordance with normal practice in the United Nations and our own independence to ask another delegation to do what all delegations will assume that we are going to do.

7. I think it would also be desirable to arrange for you to speak to some influential group in New York such as the United Nations Correspondents Association later in the summer, perhaps sometime in August if that would be convenient. I know you spoke to much the same group in New York last month in addressing the Foreign Press Association lunch, but I am sure that with a hint from us the United Nations Association would be very glad to have you whenever you could come.

8. A visit to New York to speak to the United Nations Correspondents Association might also be combined with a return appearance on the "united or not" television programme. I have heard many favourable comments on your appearance last summer on this programme.

D. Protitch, Principal Director, Department of Political and Security Council Affairs, United Nations Secretariat.

9. While you were here I would also like, if you had no objection, to have a reception for United Nations delegates in your honour.

10. I know how far ahead you must plan your schedule and it is chiefly for that reason I am making these suggestions now.

PRESIDENCY OF THE SEVENTH GENERAL ASSEMBLY

I attach the action copy and several other copies of teletype No. 211 of April 22 from the Permanent Delegation in New York. We have kept two copies, but no other circulation than that to Under-Secretaries has occurred.

2. My remembrance of a previous conversation with you is that we agreed that the Minister would wish to keep this matter closely under his own hand and that communications of this sort might go to his office in the first instance. He may himself wish to decide what circulation, if any, papers like this should receive. Almost certainly he will wish closely to control the scale, tone, and strategy of his candidature.

3. If you agree, therefore, papers of this sort will be sent to you in action copy. This Division will be happy, of course, to take such steps as we will be asked to take in consequence of the Minister's intention. My notion is, however, that the Minister will wish general responsibility for giving advice on this particular subject to remain in his office rather than in this Division.

4. So far, the Department has appeared to think that Mr. Pearson's candidacy having become known, his election will follow more or less as a matter of course, or if any action is required, we may count upon our United States or United Kingdom friends to take it. Mr. Johnson's view is different, and I may add that the officers in my Division who are more experienced in United Nations affairs than I, agree with Mr. Johnson that Mr. Pearson's election is not a foregone conclusion, and that there should be some active campaigning unless Mr. Pearson is prepared to risk a defeat. Mr. Johnson's proposal in paragraph 6, that his officers should approach other Delegations in New York, seems to us a good one. I wonder, however, whether consideration should not be given to a further letter to our missions abroad. The only instructions our missions have are contained in Circular Document A-13/52 of February 8.

PRESIDENT OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Mr. Jean Lesage was in Ottawa today and told me that he and Mr. Johnson had been canvassing, informally, Permanent Representatives in New York regarding the candidacy for President of the General Assembly.

2. Most of the Representatives from Western Europe and Latin American countries had expressed the view that they were sure their Governments would support your candidacy. Mr. Lesage, however, had an interesting talk with Mr. Padilla Nervo, the President of the Assembly. Mr. Nervo expressed a personal desire to see you elected, but said that much would depend on whether or not a candidate was put forward from one of the Asian or Arab countries. In this case the geographical argument would have some force because Mr. Nervo himself is from a country which, geographically, could be considered as "North American". This has led Mr. Lesage to feel that your election can be assured if you can secure some prior commitment from India and Pakistan, since without their support it would be difficult for an Asian candidate to be put forward. It would also not be possible for an Arab candidate, such as Dr. Charles Malik, to make headway without the prior support of Pakistan.

3. The Representatives in New York of India and Pakistan were both approached, but in both cases their reply was that they did not know, and they would have to report to their Governments.

4. In view of this, Mr. Lesage thinks, and I agree, that it might be useful if our High Commissioners in New Delhi and Karachi could be instructed to inform the Governments of India and Pakistan, officially, of your candidacy and to ask for their support. In the case of the High Commissioner in Karachi, he might be asked to enquire from the Pakistan Government if they have knowledge of any other candidate. This might serve to indicate whether or not there is any possibility that Pakistan has been considering supporting a candidate from one of the Arab countries, such as Dr. Charles Malik of Lebanon.<sup>46</sup>

PRESIDENCY OF THE SEVENTH SESSION OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

You will note from the attached telegram No. 434 of July 16+ from the Canadian Permanent Delegation in New York that Muniz, the Permanent Representative of Brazil, intends to cable his government to suggest that they might canvass other countries with a view to enlisting their support for your candidature. Muniz plans that this action will forstall other candidates and it is presumed that the other countries to which he refers are Latin American countries. Mr. Johnson has thanked Muniz for this friendly gesture and raised no objection to his proposal.

Our Latin American missions have received no information concerning the presidency of the Seventh Session since our circular document of February 8, 1952, which indicated that you were a serious candidate for the presidency but that no campaign was being initiated to gain support for our candidature. In all probability our Heads of Post in Latin America have already indicated informally to the appropriate authorities that you would be willing to serve. They have presumably not gone any further than this. Muniz' proposal again brings this question to the fore and it would appear to me that whether or not the Brazilian Government decide to take the initiative, we should now ask the posts concerned to remind the appropriate authorities of your candidature and to express the hope that they will lend their support. I would not suggest that our Heads of Post in Latin America be asked to make an official approach, similar to that being made to the Indians and the Pakistanis, but I think that an informal approach at this time will be pleasing to the Latin Americans. I should be glad to know whether you agree that instructions to this effect should be sent to our Latin American posts.<sup>47</sup>

Please take action as suggested above. L.B. P[earson]

I have prepared the two attached draft air telegrams for your approval, if you agree to the proposed course of action. One of these telegrams would be for despatch to the Canadian Embassy in Rio de Janeiro and the other telegram could be sent to the remaining posts in Latin America.<sup>48</sup>

1. In your letter under reference you ask us to let you know whether we consider there are any other steps which might usefully be taken at this stage in connection with Mr. Pearson's candidature for the Presidency of the Assembly.

2. We have, as you know, been hesitant about making judgments of this kind, and we know the Minister's reluctance to embark on any kind of campaign such as other candidates have carried on for similar offices in the past. I do think, however, that the time has come when we should nail down, informally but as firmly as possible, the votes of as many countries as we can. We now know that the Soviet bloc will probably have a candidate, and that they have already begun to campaign among Arab delegations and probably others as well (our teletype No. 493 of August 12).† Although I do not suggest that the comparison is really applicable because the major Western Powers are not likely to split on Mr. Pearson's candidature, we have been reminded by a member of the United States Mission interested in supporting Mr. Pearson that Byelorussia almost edged out Greece in the Security Council elections at the last Assembly. Canadian delegations have been told before that they would have had more votes if they had asked for them in time.

I agree. [L.B. Pearson]

3. The present position, according to information available to us in New York, is that we have firm commitments from 13 countries (the 12 mentioned in our letters No. 896 of July 25† and No. 837 of July 10,† plus Peru) and favourable responses from 17 other countries. This does not yet give us a clear majority, even if all the countries which have responded favourably to our approaches vote for Mr. Pearson.

4. The campaign for a Soviet nominee as President will, in our opinion, not make very much headway. We may anticipate that it will be argued on the following grounds:

(a) that the Soviet bloc has never before provided the President of the General Assembly;

(b) that "their turn" is overdue; and

(c) that the election of Mr. Pearson would be turning the United Nations into a "tool of NATO" and would therefore be "provocative".

5. Taking for the moment as gloomy a view as possible, I think it must be conceded that Mr. Santa Cruz might find himself in a position to pick up a substantial number of votes as a compromise candidate in the atmosphere created by a vigorous Soviet campaign against Mr. Pearson's candidature. Though unlikely, this is all the more possible when we bear in mind Mr. Santa Cruz's record in the United Nations on issues concerning economic development and colonialism, which will be preoccupying an important group of delegations. Despite his statement to me that he is for "the best man for the job", namely Mr. Pearson (our teletype No. 378 of June 23),† I do not think he would be the man to miss a favourable opportunity if one were to present itself.

6. On more than one occasion in recent weeks members of both the United Kingdom and United States Delegations here have expressed the hope that we would take early and positive measures to secure as many advance commitments as possible for Mr. Pearson's candidature. Both delegations said that they were sure their governments would be only too glad to make representations on Mr. Pearson's behalf in those capitals where we might not be represented or where we thought that in any case such representations might be helpful to supplement our own.

7. On the basis of Mr. Pearson's instructions to us while he was in New York (our teletype No. 368<sup>49</sup> of June 20 and paragraph 2 of Mr. Reid's teletype No. 218 of June 3) we have not extended our approaches to delegations beyond those whom we approached in Paris towards the end of the Assembly.

8. In the light of the above, I suggest that the following concrete steps should now be considered:

(a) The Permanent Delegation in New York should systematically sound out informally all the delegations here whom we have not yet approached, except those who will obviously oppose Mr. Pearson. This would mean approaching an additional 19 delegations in New York in the same vein as our approaches to other delegations.

(b) What further informal approaches might be made through Canadian representatives in countries where we are represented diplomatically and through United Kingdom or United States representatives in other countries whose delegations we shall be approaching in New York. In particular, I think we should approach, through our Embassy in Washington, the Legations of Ethiopia, Iceland, Luxembourg and Yemen which do not have permanent representation in New York and whose Ministers in Washington are listed as accredited to the United Nations.

9. I should be grateful for your instructions.

10. Incidentally, the Netherlands Delegation here think we can safely disregard the Cuban suggestion you mentioned in your letter under reference that the Netherlands might present a candidate.

ELECTION OF OFFICERS

The seventh session got under way Tuesday morning, October 14, with addresses by the Mayor of New York, Warren Austin as Chairman of the Headquarters Advisory Committee, the Secretary General and Padilla Nervo. The Credentials Committee was then appointed. It will be made up of the representatives of Belgium, Burma, Lebanon, New Zealand, Panama, Paraguay, Sweden, USSR, United States.

2. The last item of business for the morning was the election of the President. Mr. Pearson was elected President by the record vote of 51 in favour with 5 abstentions, presumably the Soviet bloc; 4 votes were cast for Mrs. Pandit. According to a member of the Afghan delegation these 4 votes were cast by Afghanistan, Syria, Saudi Arabia and Yemen. Mr. Pearson made a short speech of acceptance to begin the afternoon session, the text of which has been sent to you separately.†

ELECTIONS TO PRINCIPAL ORGANS OF THE UNITED NATIONS

At the first part of the seventh session elections were held to fill vacancies on the Security Council, the Economic and Social Council and the Trusteeship Council. As no vacancies existed on the International Court of Justice no elections were held to that organ. Elections in the United Nations are held by secret ballot and without nominations. It is the practice of the Canadian Government not to announce its votes in these elections. This practice has of course been relaxed in certain instances and a number of countries have been informed confidentially of Canadian support for their candidatures.

Elections to the Security Council. Brazil, Turkey and The Netherlands retired from membership on the Security Council at the end of 1952. To replace these countries the General Assembly elected Colombia, Lebanon and Denmark. Canada supported the successful candidates. The membership of the Security Council for 1953 will be China, France, the U.S.S.R., the United Kingdom, the United States, Chile, Greece, Pakistan, Colombia, Denmark and Lebanon.

Elections to the Economic and Social Council. Canada completed its second term of membership on the Economic and Social Council at the end of 1952. The other retiring members were Czechoslovakia, Iran, Mexico, Pakistan and the United States. On the first ballot the following five candidates were elected to fill five of the six vacancies: Australia, India, Turkey, the United States and Venezuela. The three contenders for the sixth place, none of whom achieved the necessary 2/3 majority on the first ballot, were Czechoslovakia, Pakistan and Yugoslavia. A series of indecisive ballots were then taken and only on the 13th ballot did Yugoslavia receive the necessary 40 votes for election, as against 18 votes for Czechoslovakia. The membership of the Council for 1953 will be Argentina, Australia, Belgium, China, Cuba, Egypt, France, India, Philippines, Poland, Sweden, Turkey, United Kingdom, Uruguay, U.S.S.R., the United States, Venezuela, Yugoslavia. Canada supported all the successful candidates in this election.

Elections to the Trusteeship Council. The retiring members of the Trusteeship Council at the end of 1952 were El Salvador and Iraq. The Assembly re-elected El Salvador and elected Syria in the place of Iraq. Canada supported both successful candidates. The membership of this Council for 1953 will be Australia, Belgium, China, Dominican Republic, El Salvador, France, New Zealand, Syria, Thailand, the United Kingdom, the United States and the U.S.S.R.

Dear Mr. Pearson,

I wish to refer to our personal and confidential conversation on the eleventh of September, in which I informed you that I had decided, after lengthy consideration over many months, to submit my resignation as Secretary-General of the United Nations.

It had been my intention — as I informed you then — to take this step at the opening of the Seventh Session of the General Assembly. I have delayed until today, when the Foreign Ministers of the five Permanent Members of the Security Council are all present for the first time during this session, in the hope that this will facilitate agreement on my successor.

I shall be grateful if you would propose as a new item on the agenda "Appointment of the Secretary-General".

Yours sincerely,

PERSONAL. CONFIDENTIAL.

Ottawa, December 29, 1952

Dear Mr. St. Laurent,

I have been meaning to write you for some time concerning a development at the recent United Nations Assembly which is of great significance for the world organization, and may have some special significance for myself. I am referring to the notice of resignation given by the Secretary-General, Mr. Lie, last November. I am not myself certain that this notice will result in Mr. Lie's actual departure. It may be that if agreement on a successor is impossible, Mr. Lie will be persuaded to remain for a further and longer term of office. There are some cynical people who even suggest that he had this in mind in raising the issue, and that the impossibility of agreement on a successor will make it possible for him to lay down his own conditions for a renewed contract. He may have had this in the back of his mind, but I think myself that he was also sincere in announcing his intention to resign. The two things are not necessarily incompatible.

So far as Mr. Lie's successor is concerned, there have been as yet none of the discussions between the permanent members of the Council which are essential if a nomination is to emerge from the Security Council. However, if Mr. Lie persists in his resignation, steps will soon have to be taken which will either result in agreement on a successor, or prove that no such agreement is possible. The Russians are so anxious to get rid of Lie that it is possible that they may accept almost anyone to succeed him if they are pressed hard enough by the British and the Americans. Before this happens, however, they are bound to put forward a number of candidates who will not be acceptable to Washington or London or Paris, even though some of them may not provoke a veto. Among these candidates, the names most frequently mentioned are Rómulo (Philippines), Entezam (Iran), Nervo (Mexico), and myself. Certainly the Russians would never agree to me unless agreement on any other candidate is impossible, in which case they might accept me as the last alternative to the re-appointment of the present Secretary-General.

Though the contingency, therefore, is a remote one, I think I should let you know that if my name did come from the Security Council for recommendation to the Assembly, as the only person on whom they could agree, I would not, I think, be able to refuse the nomination. As I see it, the situation is not the same as that which arose over the NATO Secretary-Generalship where there was no possibility of a deadlock on candidates, and where the Organization had such a close and direct relationship to us that the position of a Canadian as Secretary-General might be misunderstood in our own country and complicate Canadian policy to NATO.<sup>50</sup>

I mention this matter now, not because I think I am likely to be confronted with the problem it involves, but because I feel that I should tell you in advance how I would be disposed to act in case such a development occurred. I would, of course, take no final action without consulting you.<sup>51</sup>

[Ottawa,] October 8, 1952

It is recommended that the following general instructions be approved as guidance for the Canadian Delegation to the seventh session of the General Assembly of the United Nations:

General

There is no reason to believe that the seventh session of the General Assembly will witness any progress towards general solution of the differences between the Soviet world and the free world. No action should be taken by the United Nations, nevertheless, which would gravely prejudice the possibility of a satisfactory accommodation in the future. As the United Nations still provides opportunities for contacts between the Cominform states and the rest of the world and as the withdrawal of the Soviet Union from the United Nations would only lead to breaking off this contact without in any way altering the present world balance of power, the Delegation should not support any initiative which would force the Soviet Union from the organization.

2. There is another cleavage within the ranks of the United Nations which is potentially almost as dangerous as the rift between Soviet and non-Soviet nations — the cleavage between the countries of the West and the countries of Asia, Africa and Latin-America. It is increasingly obvious that if Soviet expansionism is to be resisted the active support or, at least, the benevolent neutrality of the nations of Asia and Latin-America must be secured and maintained. A subsidiary but important reason for seeking the active goodwill of the under-developed countries is that their votes are required at the General Assembly or other United Nations organs to ensure a majority for resolutions to which the West attaches great importance, particularly in politico-strategic questions such as Korea. In the past, the debates and decisions of the United Nations have tended to widen the gap between the Western countries and the others. At the seventh session of the General Assembly the Arab and Asian countries, supported in many issues by the Latin Americans, will fervently urge courses of action unpalatable, perhaps unacceptable to one or more of the important Western countries. The agenda items on Tunisia, South Africa and on colonial questions will bring these differences into sharp focus. It seems certain that on a number of specific agenda items the Canadian attitude will not coincide with that of the Asian and Latin-American nations and that the Canadian Delegation will not be able to offer these countries its unqualified support. Nevertheless, a constant effort should be made to give them as great a measure of satisfaction as is consistent with Canadian defence and political interests and to seek their sympathetic understanding of the Canadian position. The goal of decreasing the differences between the West and the countries of Asia and Latin-America should remain constant even though it is fully recognized that the Delegation will not be in a position to serve this aim on every occasion.

3. The battle of propaganda between the Soviet and the Western delegations may be expected to follow its usual course at the seventh session. In discussions among a number of friendly countries it has been decided that the Western propaganda theme which has most justification and which would be most effective would be to deplore and protest against the incessant stream of Cominform hate against the United States and other Western countries. The United Kingdom Delegation has agreed to take a lead in pointing out the discrepancy between the much-publicized Communist "Peace Campaign" and the actual campaign of hate which the Soviet Union and its associates are conducting. It would be appropriate for the Canadian Delegation to allude to the hate campaign on suitable occasions but it would not be desirable for the Delegation to play too active or prominent a role in the propaganda struggle.

Disarmament

4. The Disarmament Commission, which was set up by the General Assembly at its last session to replace both the former Atomic Energy Commission and the Commission on Conventional Armaments, has so far made no progress in breaking the continued deadlock between the fundamentally opposed and as yet unreconciled positions of the Soviet Union and the Western Powers. The Soviet representative in the Commission has refused to modify by a single detail the unacceptable Soviet proposals submitted to the last Assembly and has declined either to table further proposal or to discuss seriously the proposals so far put forward by the Western Powers. In the Commission's deliberations Canada has expressed general support for the most important Western proposals so far submitted to the Commission — that on the numerical limitation of all armed forces.

5. The report of the Commission is consequently a rather colourless summary of the meetings it has held and the proposals it has discussed and contains neither conclusions nor recommendations. If on the basis of this report an undramatic resolution is introduced at the Assembly contrasting the Soviet and Western attitudes shown in the Commission, approving the initiatives taken by the Western Powers and instructing the Commission to continue its work on the basis of the instructions from the sixth session of the Assembly and the working papers already before it, the Delegation should support such a resolution. If, however, the Soviet Union attempts to link the disarmament issue with the "peaceful co-existence" theme in a general propaganda offensive, it will probably be necessary for the Delegation to take a more active line. In this case, the Delegation should be prepared to assist in exposing the intransigence of the position so far taken by the Soviet Union on disarmament, while at the same time making clear our readiness to examine any reasonable proposals that are made. It should also be emphasized that the consistent refusal of the Soviet representative in the Disarmament Commission to discuss seriously the proposals so far submitted by the Western Powers may effectively prevent the further development of these proposals into a comprehensive disarmament plan.

Collective Measures

6. The studies which the General Assembly instructed the Collective Measures Committee to continue this year on methods which might be used to maintain and strengthen international peace and security in accordance with the purposes and principles of the Charter have not resulted in any substantial additions to the conclusions and recommendations embodied in the Committee's previous report. In its report to the seventh session of the Assembly the Committee has recommended that an appropriate United Nations body should continue general studies on this subject and should keep under review the progress of member states in preparing for participation in United Nations collective action.

7. The Delegation should continue to be guided by the basic principle that was accepted last year, namely, that the United Nations, though not the appropriate body to direct actual military operations, should in the event of a general war be used by the Western Powers as an agency for securing the maximum support from states not directly and initially participating in military operations. The Delegation may therefore support adoption of the Collective Measures Committee's report, emphasizing that in doing so the Canadian Government is only recommending certain lines of procedure to be followed in the event of the United Nations taking collective action in the future and is not agreeing now to undertake any specific commitments in those circumstances. The Delegation may also state that, in view of its existing commitments in Korea and of the obligations arising out of participation in the collective defence effort of NATO, the Canadian Government does not at present contemplate the recruiting and organization of further units of its armed forces for service with the United Nations, but that present Canadian legislation would enable the Canadian Government to carry out such economic and financial measures against an aggressor as might be called for by the United Nations, provided they were considered appropriate by the Canadian Government and approved by Parliament.

Tunisia and Morocco

8. A separate memorandum on these important agenda items has been prepared.

Asian Questions

9. The only Asian question of major importance on the agenda is that concerning Korea. A separate memorandum has been prepared on this subject. It follows immediately after this memorandum in the Commentary. In recent sessions of the Assembly the impact and force of the underdeveloped countries of Asia most of which have recently emerged from colonial status have been a conspicuous feature. Their influence, generally aligned against the policies pursued by most Western countries, has been particularly noticeable in consideration of items relating to economic development, human rights and the evolution towards self-government of dependent territories. Of more recent origin is the appearance of the Arab-Asian bloc — an association of the Arab states with the countries of the Indian sub-continent and South East Asia. This group, normally comprising thirteen states, possesses common objectives and a common determination to advance towards these objectives. Usually it will have the support of the Soviet group and frequently that of the Latin-Americans. The motives of the component countries of the bloc run from malicious resentment through calculated self-interest to genuine, well-intentioned purposes conceived and pursued in good faith. Regardless of motives, the Arab-Asian bloc is a force increasingly to be reckoned with and lived with: the Delegation would do well on any question of importance to consider what the likely reaction of this bloc will be and to make efforts, within the bounds of good sense and legitimate national interest, to meet partway or help to guide the purposes of the Arab-Asians.

Palestine Questions

10. In matters relating to the Palestine dispute the Canadian Delegation should aim at solid rather than rapid progress in broadening the areas of agreement between Israel and its neighbours. For this purpose it should co-operate with delegates who understand the problems of both parties and have an unaffected sympathy for both, and keep in touch with moderates in the Assembly who may have special influence either with the Arabs or with Israel. On both sides grievances are genuine, cut very deep, and are seriously aggravated by a sense of past or present persecution which intensifies the fear of future injustice. This makes it very difficult for either Arabs or Israelis to think in terms of mutual accommodation. Well-informed, unexcited, fair and friendly help from other delegations is needed if the balance is to be kept steady.

11. At Paris in January 1952 both sides offered to engage in negotiations for a peace settlement but neither recognized the validity of the other's offer. Israel insists that a peace settlement must grow out of the status quo which is governed by the 1949 armistice arrangements. The Arabs, on the contrary, remind the Assembly that the armistice agreements were not to prejudice the terms of the ultimate peace settlement. They point out that status quo does not conform with past recommendations of the General Assembly and say that the starting point for any peace settlement should be the implementation of past Assembly resolutions. Israel replies that before the Assembly makes recommendations the parties to the dispute should themselves try to reach agreement. The Arabs respond that this is not the position the Jewish Agency took in 1947 when the United Kingdom Government suggested that the Assembly should seek agreement between Arabs and Jews as a basis for its recommendations for the future government of Palestine. This argument will be continued during the seventh session.

12. Israel now controls the area earmarked for a Jewish state in the Assembly's partition resolution of November 1947, as well as half of the territory which was to have comprised an Arab state. This has meant additional displacement of Arabs. The Arab states are asking not only for boundary adjustments which would automatically permit many of the 800,000 refugees to return to their former homes but also for implementation of Assembly resolutions on repatriation of refugees to territory which will continue to be under Israel's control. In January 1952, however, they accepted for the first time the principle of resettlement of refugees in Arab countries without prejudice to their right to ultimate repatriation. In July and August of this year, Arab political leaders toured the refugee areas openly preaching, for the first time, the doctrine of resettlement, which was confirmed in September by the Council of the Arab League. Now that this concession has been obtained from the Arabs the next objective should be to secure the release of blocked funds of Arab refugees in Israeli banks and to achieve agreement on the procedure to be followed in arranging for compensation of refugees for abandoned property. (Israel has acknowledged from the outset its moral obligation to make suitable compensation.) Success in agreeing on these two matters during the seventh session should relieve to some extent the existing tensions in the Middle East and be conducive to later agreement between Israel and the Arab states on other outstanding issues.

13. Although Israel would prefer direct, separate bilateral negotiations with its neighbours, the Arabs are anxious to have the continued aid of the United Nations, and this should not be denied. The Canadian Delegation should continue to support the principle that although the governments concerned have primary responsibility for settling their outstanding differences, United Nations facilities must continue to be provided to aid them.

Economic Questions

14. The main economic issue which has in the past been the subject of so much controversy and unfortunate conflict between the industrialized and the under-developed countries of the world, has been the question of an international development fund. Since ECOSOC at its fourteenth session decided unanimously, except for the Soviet Bloc, to appoint a committee of experts to carry out the General Assembly's directive to draw up detailed plans for such a fund and since the report of the experts cannot be submitted until next year, this subject, although it appears on the agenda, should not present its usual difficulties.

15. The under-developed countries in ECOSOC, having initiated the proposal for an expert committee and therefore for a postponement of the issue, are hardly likely to attempt to reverse the Council's decision in the General Assembly. It is to be hoped that the item will be dealt with in a routine manner as being procedural in nature. The Delegation should do what it can to discourage general discussion on the substance of the issue on the grounds that such discussion would be premature and time-wasting pending the report of the experts.

South Africa

16. There are three items affecting South Africa on the agenda. On the first, South West Africa the U.N. Ad Hoc Committee on South West Africa is now conferring in secret with representatives of the South African Government on ways and means of implementing the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice. If the Ad Hoc Committee recommends that these negotiations be continued for a third year, the Canadian Delegation should support this recommendation. If, however, the Ad Hoc Committee reports no progress, the Delegation should continue Canada's present policy of being critical of South Africa's attitude since it is the Canadian view that advisory opinions of the International Court should be accepted in the interests of promoting the rule of law and enhancing the prestige of the Court. During the past year there has been no progress on the second question, Treatment of People of Indian Origin in the Union of South Africa. Direct negotiations between the governments concerned would be the best way of reaching a settlement; failing this, Canada has consistently advocated that the dispute should be referred to the International Court for an advisory opinion on the law and the facts of the dispute. On the third problem of Race Conflict in South Africa, if a vote cannot be avoided on an Indian or an Arab-Asian resolution disapproving of South Africa's apartheid policy, the Canadian Delegation should support the resolution unless it is phrased in extreme terms. A separate memorandum has been prepared on this subject.

Questions of Dependent Territories

17. The seventh session of the Assembly will have before it various items regarding colonial and trust territories, many of which are of a technical nature relating to the administration and to the social, economic and educational conditions of these territories. Certain themes will however predominate and chief among these will be the efforts of the non-administering states to dictate to the Trusteeship Council the way in which it should carry out its work. They will also try to extend the terms of reference of the Committee on Information from Non-self-governing Territories which examine information submitted by administering states on economic, social and educational conditions in their colonial possessions. It is the Canadian view that the Assembly should decide on broad matters of policy regarding trust territories and leave to the Trusteeship Council the right to deal with the administrative details. The provisions of the Charter regarding non-self-governing territories are specific in describing the information to be transmitted by the administering states and the attempts which have been made in the past by some of the anti-colonial powers to persuade the administering states to transmit political information have been, in effect, an attempt to amend the provisions of the Charter. The move to amend the Charter insofar as non-self-governing territories are concerned would require the concurrence of the administering states if the amendment were to have any effective value. The Canadian Delegation should therefore oppose any attempt to widen the terms of reference of the Committee on Information or the scope of the Charter provisions unless this extension is approved by the administering states themselves.

18. An important feature of recent sessions has been the generally acrimonious atmosphere in the Fourth or Trusteeship Committee of the Assembly. A large group of non-administering powers consider that the states which are responsible for the administration of dependent territories are not making a sincere effort to achieve in these territories the goal of self government or independence envisaged in the Charter. Beside this group of states which are genuinely concerned about the future of dependent territories is ranged a number of states which for various reasons is glad to seize any opportunity to criticize the administering authorities. As a result, the work of the administering states is, at each session of the Assembly, subjected to close scrutiny and criticism and the gap between the positions of these two opposing factions is becoming increasingly apparent.

19. In the past Canada has tried to bring about some measure of agreement between these two groups by seeking to modify the stands of both sides. Efforts of this nature should continue to be of constant concern to the Canadian Delegation when colonial and dependent territories are being discussed at the seventh session.

Legal Questions

20. The most important legal questions on the agenda are those concerning the draft Code of Offences against the Peace and Security of Mankind, the allied question of defining aggression, and the proposed establishment of an international criminal court. The draft Code, which has been prepared by the International Law Commission, consists of a list of political offences applicable to individuals, in some cases acting as government agents and in other cases in their personal capacities. The question of defining aggression was first raised in the United Nations by the Soviet Delegation at the fifth session of the Assembly. Neither the International Law Commission nor the Legal Committee of the Assembly at last year's session were able to agree on a satisfactory definition. The proposed statute for an international criminal court would, when approved, establish a criminal court to try persons accused primarily of international political crimes. It will then be open to individual governments to accept the jurisdiction of the court by adhering to separate conventions designed for that purpose.

21. The Canadian Delegation should co-operate in the drafting of the Code and of the statute for the court, both of which, it is considered, should be submitted to governments before they are finally approved by the Assembly. An attempt to define aggression in the present state of international distrust and suspicion is fraught with difficulties and dangers. Almost any definition would not be an exhaustive one and, therefore, Cominform states might plan any future aggressive moves, whether of a direct or indirect nature, so as to circumvent the terms of any definition approved by the Assembly. Nevertheless, if the United Kingdom, the United States and other NATO powers decide that it is necessary to answer Soviet propaganda and to satisfy other important friendly delegations, to attempt to arrive at a satisfactory definition, the Canadian Delegation should co-operate to this end.

UNITED NATIONS GENERAL ASSEMBLY; INSTRUCTIONS TO CANADIAN DELEGATION TO THE SEVENTH SESSION

29. The Secretary of State For External Affairs submitted recommendations concerning instructions to the Canadian delegation to the Seventh Session of the General Assembly of the United Nations.

Explanatory memoranda had been circulated.

30. Mr. Pearson commented as follows:

(a) General Instructions

The session promised to be a difficult one with a sharper Soviet propaganda offensive as part of their "hate" campaign against the United States. A more dangerous cleavage for the West than that between the Soviet and non-Soviet countries was, however, that between the West and the countries of Asia, Africa and Latin America. The delegation should constantly have in mind the importance of decreasing the difficulties between the West and those countries, even though it would not be in a position to serve that aim on every occasion. On disarmament, the delegation might support a resolution based on the report of the Disarmament Commission approving the initiatives taken by the Western powers. If the Soviet attempted to link the issue with the "peaceful co-existence" theme, the delegation might take a more active line in assisting to expose the intransigence of the position of the Soviet on disarmament. On collective measures the delegation should continue to be guided by the basic principles accepted last year. In matters relating to the Palestine dispute the delegation should aim at solid, rather than rapid, progress in broadening the areas of agreement between Israel and its neighbours. In questions relating to dependent territories, the delegation should continue the effort to bring about some measure of agreement between the administering states and the non-administering group. Other instructions were outlined in relation to legal and economic questions and other matters.

(b) Tunisia and Morocco

Questions on Tunisia and Morocco would raise a number of delicate issues. The delegation should endeavour to go some way to satisfy the Arab and Asian nations that their interest in the struggle of colonial peoples was not being ignored while, at the same time, preventing any action that might produce a crisis in France. The Canadian representative should vote in favour of including the item on the agenda; either abstain or vote in favour of competence depending on circumstances; and might support a mild type of resolution noting the progress in Tunisia under French protection and expressing the hope that further constitutional reforms would be worked out by peaceful co-operation between the two parties. A similar and consistent attitude should be adopted in relation to the Moroccan question.

(c) South Africa

Three items would be on the agenda; one relating to South West Africa; one to the treatment of people of Indian origin in the Union of South Africa; and an item sponsored by all 13 Arab-Asian countries concerning the race conflict in South Africa. The first two did not present as great difficulties as the third. With regard to it, it was recommended that the delegation abstain on the vote whether the item be included on the official agenda; that it support a resolution, if proposed, to refer the question to the International Court; that if a vote on an Indian or an Arab-Asian resolution expressing disapproval of South Africa's apartheid policy could not be avoided, the Canadian delegation support it if it were in reasonable terms.

(d) Korea

Basic Canadian policy was to limit hostilities to the Korean peninsula and to support proposals which would facilitate the armistice negotiations, while at the same time opposing demands for the forcible repatriation of prisoners of war. The United States was considering a two-stage proposal: the first a resolution endorsing the stand taken by the United Nations negotiators in Korea and calling on the communists to accept it; and the second, following the expected negative reply or failure to reply by the Communists, a proposal calling for action by the Additional Measures Committee and the General Assembly for further political and economic sanctions against communist China and North Korea. It was recommended that the delegation support the first resolution, if put forward, but strongly resist the introduction in it of any kind of ultimatum to the communists. It should be made clear that this support did not imply any commitment to support the second stage if the United States followed through with it. The delegation should point out the dangers in the Secretary-General's proposal for an appeal for more volunteers for Korea. If the Mexican proposal on asylum for prisoners were brought forward, the delegation should not oppose it but make an effort to ensure that the commitment to give asylum would be the primary responsibility of those countries that had not been able to send military forces to Korea.

31. The Prime Minister said that, so far as the instructions relating to the agenda item on race conflict in South Africa were concerned, the delegation should not be authorized to vote in favour of a resolution expressing disapproval of the South African policy without having referred the actual text of the resolution to Ottawa for consideration. The same applied with regard to possible support for resolutions concerning Tunisia and Morocco. In each case reference should be made for further direction.

32. The Minister of National Defence thought the second stage of the proposed United States action with regard to Korea was extremely dangerous. There was nothing that held out so much prospect for an extension of hostilities and for bringing on a general war. Any attempt at sanctions or blockade would lead to retaliation and possible Soviet intervention. The delegation should do everything possible to see that the United States did not bring this second stage before the Assembly. With regard to the Secretary-General's proposal of a call for volunteers, the paragraph in the instructions that the Canadian delegation had "no authority to give any commitment regarding the dispatch of additional Canadian forces to Korea" was too mild. There could be no consideration of such a possibility.

33. The Cabinet, after considerable discussion, approved the recommendations of the Secretary of State for External Affairs concerning the general instructions to the Canadian delegation to the Seventh Session of the General Assembly of the United Nations and the particular instructions relating to questions on Tunisia and Morocco on race conflict in South Africa and on Korea; with the understanding that the delegation be directed not to support a substantive resolution concerning the situation in Tunisia or Morocco or a resolution expressing disapproval of South Africa's apartheid policy without first referring the texts of such resolutions to Ottawa for further consideration by the Cabinet.

[New York], October 24, 1952

Mr. Eban and Mr. Lourie<sup>57</sup> of the Israeli Delegation called to see me this afternoon to discuss the Arab-Israel items on the agenda of the Ad Hoc committee. They expressed the hope that no resolution would be passed by the committee which would complicate and make more difficult the work of Arab-Israel pacification, especially as there were some signs now of progress in this direction on the spot. Therefore, the Israeli Delegation hope that at the proper time a resolution could be introduced and sponsored by some "neutral" delegations, which would merely instruct the parties to the dispute to meet together with a view to the solution of outstanding problems. He did not think that the United Nations could profitably intervene again in this matter, but he did think that a U.N. resolution, telling the parties to get together, would have a fairly good prospect of implementation; as the Egyptians especially, under the new regime, might be glad to use such a resolution to justify direct talks to their own people.

He also hoped that no steps would be taken to enlarge the Palestine Conciliation Commission, but that the work of the present Commission could be endorsed and that it could be asked to get ahead with that work.

I told Mr. Eban that I was sure that you and other members of the delegation would be glad to talk with him about these ideas, which commanded

Addressed External No. 134, repeated Beaver No. 30.

Following from Johnson, Begins:

1. Eban of Israel gave a lunch today for representatives of Australia, Norway, the Netherlands and Canada. Eban's purpose was to give this small group Israel's views with regard to the handling of the remaining Palestine items on the agenda of the Ad Hoc Committee.

2. Eban then repeated what he had previously told me, namely that it was Israel's hope that the General Assembly's main recommendation would be to call on the parties to sit down and negotiate a settlement among themselves. He gave much the same reasons as he gave me at our previous interview. He stressed the fact that settlements of disputes between independent States can only be reached by negotiation. He cited Israel's recent agreement with West Germany as an example of what he had in mind. In the present day there were hardly any other example of States refusing to talk to each other or communicate in any way.

3. Eban's main reason for suggesting that the General Assembly should take this line is that he is even more hopeful now than he was at our previous interview that Israel could sit down with Egypt and make some progress towards a settlement. He said that when Syria heard of the overtures which Israel had made to Egypt, Syria, afraid that its interests might be ignored by Egypt in any settlement, had a talk with Israel under the aegis of General Riley.

4. To show what Israel has in mind, Eban circulated a draft resolution the text of which is set out in my immediately following telegram.

5. Eban then turned to the question of sponsorship. In the past, he said, the United States, United Kingdom, France and Turkey had usually sponsored resolutions on the Palestine problem. He doubted if that course would be advisable now. France has more than its share of troubles with the Arab States and the United Kingdom is embroiled with Egypt. Eban's hope is that a group of central [neutral?] States<sup>58</sup> might sponsor a resolution along the lines suggested by him. He has in mind the States represented at the luncheon, namely Australia, the Netherlands, Norway, Canada, and one or two Latin American States, for example Brazil and Mexico.

6. Eban said that he had spoken to Ross and Barco of the United States mission about this matter. They indicated that they sympathized with the objective Eban had in mind but did not wish to comment on the terms of the resolution or the tactics to be employed. Eban has also spoken to Ordonneau of France and Baran of Turkey.

7. The representatives of Australia and Norway indicated that they approved the objective which Eban had in mind but naturally did not wish to make any comment on the language of the draft resolution or the question of sponsorship. No other representatives made any comments of any importance.

8. Eban hoped that the question of Jerusalem would not be raised. If, however, it is raised, he hopes it will be raised in a constructive manner. For example, he said the question whether or not the Israeli Foreign Office should be moved to Jerusalem is not the Jerusalem question. Already eighteen government departments are in Jerusalem and it is a question for the Israeli Government to decide whether the nineteenth, namely the Foreign Office, should also be there. Israel he said would be quite happy to accept either of the following solutions to the Jerusalem problem which had previously been suggested, namely:

- (a) A United Nations Commission to administer the Holy Places, or
- (b) An enclave under United Nations sovereignty which would include the Holy Places.

9. Naturally I hope to discuss these questions with Mr. Pearson and Mr. Martin, but I shall welcome any comments you may have to make with regard to the advice which I might give to them. Ends.

Draft Resolution

Violation by Arab States of their obligations under the Charter, United Nations resolution and specific provisions of the General Armistice Agreement, concluded with Israel, requiring them to desist from policies and practices of hostility and to seek agreement by negotiations for the establishment of peaceful relations with Israel.

The General Assembly

REAFFIRMING that it remains the primary duty of all members of the United Nations, when involved in an international dispute, to seek settlement of such a dispute by peaceful means through the procedures laid down in the Charter;

RECALLING that the past resolutions of the United Nations have called upon the parties to extend the scope of the existing General Armistice Agreements and to achieve at an early date agreement on final settlement of their outstanding differences;

CONSIDERING that it is the principal purpose of the United Nations in the Palestine question to promote the early establishment of normal and stable relations between the State of Israel and the Arab States;

CONSIDERING that the governments concerned have the primary responsibility for reaching a settlement of their outstanding differences;

TAKING NOTE of the recommendation of the Conciliation Commission for Palestine contained in its supplementary report dated 23 October 1950 (A/1367 REV.1) and repeated in subsequent reports, that "the General Assembly should urge the parties to engage without delay in direct discussions, under the auspices of the United Nations and with its assistance, in order to arrive at a peaceful settlement;"

NOTING with concern the statement contained in paragraph A.85 of the conclusions of the progress report of the Conciliation Commission for Palestine for the period from 23 January to 19 November 1951 (A/1985) that "the Arab Governments in their contacts with the Commission have evinced no readiness to arrive at such a peace settlement with the Government of Israel;"

FINDS that the continuance of this unsettled situation four years after the termination of hostilities endangers international peace and security in the area and impedes the prospects of social progress and economic development in the Far East;

EXPRESSES its belief that the establishment of direct contacts between the parties involved in this dispute is the precondition for its peaceful settlement;

URGES the parties to refrain from any hostile acts, to abstain from threats to the territorial integrity and political independence of any State, and to desist from any other hostile activities inconsistent with the principles and purposes of the Charter of the United Nations and the General Armistice Agreements;

CALLS upon the Arab States and Israel to enter without delay into direct negotiations for the establishment of peaceful and neighbourly relations with a view to the attainment of permanent peace in the Near East. Ends.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY — PALESTINE ITEMS

Reference: Your telegrams 134 and 135 of October 31, 1952.

1. We have considered Eban's suggestions carefully and have the following observations to make:

2. Israel's hopes of early negotiations with the new Egyptian government seem not unreasonable. The moderation and practical good sense shown by Naguib<sup>59</sup> last week in handling Egyptian public opinion on the extremely delicate Sudan issue mark him out as a leader of ability who is ambitious to establish Egypt's external relations on a normal working basis. We now have to decide what form of Assembly resolution would be most likely to expedite an agreement between Egypt and Israel.

3. Since December 1948 the Assembly has made a practice of calling on the parties to settle outstanding issues either by direct negotiations, for which Israel has been asking for the past two years, or by negotiations through the Conciliation Commission, on which the Arabs have come to rely for protection of their rights under the terms of past Assembly resolutions. Israel wants direct negotiations to be based on the armistice agreements of 1949. The Arabs object because the armistice agreements have nothing to say on the question of the rights of refugees, to which the Conciliation Commission has given constant attention. Eban's draft resolution calls only for direct negotiations between the parties, without mentioning the alternative of negotiations through the Conciliation Commission.

4. For this reason the Arabs are likely to react rather strongly to operative paragraphs 2 and 4 of the proposed draft. They will also object that the second recital of the preamble invokes only past Security Council resolutions relating to the armistice agreements and ignores the broader recommendations of the Assembly itself. They will want to have the final recital of the preamble either thrown out or broadened to include references to paragraphs 83, 84 and 86 of the Conciliation Commission's report to balance the reference to paragraph 85.<sup>60</sup>

5. We approve the Israeli objective of fostering direct negotiations, as pointed out in paragraph 13 of the general instructions accompanying the Commentary.<sup>61</sup> It is also our feeling, however, that any Assembly resolution should continue to recognize the role of the Conciliation Commission and that deliberate omission of such a reference, as well as other features of the draft resolution, would impede rather than improve the prospects of direct negotiations taking place, in view of the Arab interest in maintaining the Assembly's role in the question. It is not improbable, for example, that Naguib would find it easier to engage in the desired negotiations with Israel if there is no sudden reversal of policy by the Assembly to arouse general resentment in the Arab world. A resolution similar to that of January 26, 1952 would have the double advantage of making it easier for Naguib to negotiate with Israel and of consolidating the gains recently made by the Conciliation Commission in breaking the long deadlock over the settlement of refugee property claims. We should, however, be interested to know if you see any possibility of meeting Eban's desire for greater emphasis on the principle of direct negotiation without upsetting the delicate balance achieved through the resolutions adopted during the sixth session.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY — PALESTINE ITEMS

Reference: My teletype No. 135 of October 31, 1952

Paragraphs 83, 84 and 86 note that the Conciliation Commission had made little progress in helping the parties resolve their differences because of their unwillingness to implement the General Assembly resolutions under which the Commission operated. Paragraph 84 notes Israel's failure to permit the return of refugees. Paragraph 85 notes the Arab governments' reluctance to settle the question with Israel. Paragraph 86 expresses the Conciliation Commission's willingness to continue its mediation efforts.

Addressed Ottawa No. 314, repeated Washington No. 94.

Following for Johnson, Begins:

1. Eban's draft resolution (text in my teletype under reference) still hangs fire. Norway seems inclined to sponsor provided the draft can be made more impartial. The Netherlands delegation seems divided and will not make up its mind until later.

2. The Arabs have now put in a resolution, the official text of which is not available yet, which would recall all past assembly resolutions on Palestine and would note (a) that the Palestine Conciliation Commission has been unable to fulfil its mandate, and (b) that the repatriation, compensation, resettlement and rehabilitation of refugees have not been effected. It would thank and dismiss the Palestine Conciliation Commission and substitute for it a seven-member commission (dropping the word "conciliation" from its title) whose task would be:

(a) To secure a just and equitable settlement of the Palestine problem in accordance with past resolutions of the General Assembly;

(b) To facilitate the early repatriation, resettlement, compensation and rehabilitation of refugees; and

(c) To take necessary measures for protection and restitution of rights, priorities and interests of refugees.

The governments concerned would be called upon to co-operate with the commission, which would be authorized to appoint subsidiary bodies and employ technical experts.

3. The Arab draft resolution does not raise directly the issue of an international regime for Jerusalem. This is implicit, however, in the provision that the proposed commission should secure a settlement of the Palestine problem "in accordance with the resolutions of the General Assembly." The Secretariat is concerned about an incident fully reported in the press last summer connected with the attempt of Israel to send up to Mt. Scopus in a food convoy, in contravention of the Mt. Scopus Agreement of July 7, 1948 (which is to continue in effect until the final peace settlement), a barrel from which a metal object protruded which might have been a machine gun. You will recall that Israel not only refused to allow United Nations truce observers to inspect the barrel but, contrary to the agreement, sent in troops to guard it until it was finally returned, unopened, to Israeli territory. The Arabs are expected to use this incident as a peg on which to hang an argument for full international control of the Jerusalem area if they have now decided to break with Jordan on this issue. In Jordan, as you know, there is a strong movement in favour of having the seat of government maintained for only six months of the year in Amman and moved to Jerusalem for the remaining six months to satisfy the people of the West Bank that the government is being run in their interests as well as in the interests of the remainder of the country. Jordan agrees with Israel in opposing internationalization of Jerusalem.

4. We discussed yesterday with the Netherlands delegation and the Secretariat and today with the United Kingdom delegation the question of procedure. Kyrrou<sup>62</sup> is likely to try to get the committee's consent to have the two items taken together. If he fails because of Arab opposition, the committee will proceed to debate Item 67,<sup>63</sup> having before it at first only the Arab draft resolution. The United Kingdom delegation hopes that a neutral state may then sponsor a brief, simple middle-of-the-road draft resolution covering both Items 67 and 68,<sup>64</sup> on the assumption that if this is adopted Eban will feel it unnecessary to have a separate discussion of Item 68.

5. In strict confidence Crossthwaite<sup>65</sup> showed Miss MacCallum a tentative draft of a moderate resolution which he was about to ask the Australian delegation to adopt as its own. (He agreed with Eban that this year it might be better for draft resolutions to be presented by neutral delegations rather than by the United States, United Kingdom, France and Turkey, although the usual four-Power sponsorship may still be resorted to.) Crossthwaite asked us not to let the Australians nor any others know that we had seen the draft, and pointed out that it would prejudice its chances of adoption by the committee if either the Israelis or the Arabs should find out that the draft had originated with the United Kingdom delegation. He did not give us a copy. Its principal features, however, are the following: it recalls past Assembly resolutions on Palestine (not "all" past Assembly resolutions as the Arabs wish) and particularly that of January 26, 1952. It may refer to the agreement to release blocked refugee assets and will then go on to express regret that the Conciliation Commission has not succeeded yet in obtaining a full settlement. It reminds the parties that the primary responsibilities for reaching a settlement rests upon them, calls upon the governments to refrain from hostilities and to carry out their obligations under the armistice agreements and to make an early "and genuine" effort to achieve a settlement, either by direct negotiation or by making use of the facilities provided by the United Nations. You will note that this tentative draft, which Crossthwaite gave to the Australians this afternoon, follows the line constantly reaffirmed by the Assembly since December 1948 and does not involve a departure from the policies Canada has supported in the past as the Israeli draft would do.

6. Tomorrow the delegations of the United Kingdom, United States, France and Turkey are meeting to discuss policy they will follow now that they have

GENERAL ASSEMBLY — PALESTINE ITEMS

Reference: My telegram No. 314 of November 18, 1952

Following from Johnson, Begins: This morning Miss MacCallum and I saw Jessup and Barco of the United States delegation, who informed us of yesterday's developments in connection with Israel's efforts to secure sponsors for its draft resolution, the text of which was given in my telegram No. 135 of October 31. Jessup told us that the Norwegian delegation has appropriated as its own a revised Israeli draft, the text of which we subsequently received from the Israeli delegation. This omits the sixth recital of the former preamble, which quoted out of context a comment of the conciliation commission on the uncooperative attitude of the Arabs, and it transposes the words "urges" and "calls upon" in the third and fourth operative paragraphs, but in other respects is unchanged.

2. Moe<sup>66</sup> is now trying to find co-sponsors for this new draft. His delegation has seen representatives of Mexico, Chile, Brazil, Ecuador and Uruguay and will soon call a meeting of other possible sponsors. Representatives of the United Kingdom, the United States, France and Turkey will be invited to attend as observers although these Four Powers will not be asked to sponsor. We have not been approached yet, but Jessup said Nervo has suggested to Moe that the President of the Assembly might be asked to try his hand at bringing the parties together while the Assembly is still in session. He did not say whether this would be a separate proposal to be suggested to the ad hoc political committee before it takes up Moe's draft resolution, or whether it would be embodied in the resolution itself.

3. Jessup believes that at some stage in the debate the Norwegian draft resolution will be amended by the insertion of a paragraph authorizing the Palestine conciliation commission to continue its work, although he is not averse to having the principle of direct negotiation stressed a little more strongly now than in the past. There would presumably have to be also, he thinks, some reference to past resolutions of the Assembly, to supplement the reference in the second recital of the preamble to resolutions of "the United Nations" which in this case means only the Security Council.

4. There are several indications that although the debate is likely to be violent, particularly if it coincides with the debates on Tunisia and Morocco or with the inauguration of Israel's new President in Jerusalem, the outcome may be the adoption once more of a reasonable and moderate resolution. The Arabs understand they are not likely to succeed in getting a new commission instructed to implement all past Assembly resolutions, and that the best they can hope for are renewed instructions to the conciliation commission to get ahead with its work. Eban has said privately that he could accept a resolution to this effect. This therefore is the objective the neutral delegations will presumably try to reach. Ends.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY — PALESTINE ITEMS

Reference: My telegram No. 322 of November 19.

Following from Johnson, Begins: Miss MacCallum and I attended this afternoon, November 21, a meeting of several neutral delegations convened by Moe of Norway to discuss the question of sponsorship of the revised Israeli draft resolution described in paragraph 1 of my telegram under reference. In addition to the Norwegians and ourselves, representatives of Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Denmark and the Netherlands were present. Mexico, Ecuador, Uruguay and Bolivia, although invited, were unrepresented.

2. The Netherlands delegation may sponsor the resolution provided an impartial text can be worked out and provided a large number of delegations having wide geographical distribution agree to act as co-sponsors. Both the Belgian and Netherlands delegates, like ourselves, felt that if an impartial text is to be achieved, the present draft would have to be subjected to some revision. With this in view, Moe has asked the Netherlands delegation and ourselves to meet him tomorrow morning to work out a revised draft without prejudice to the question of sponsorship on which we remain uncommitted.

3. There was general agreement that the timing of the resolution would be important. Several delegations seemed to think that the delegates both of the Arab States and of Israel should be allowed to state their respective positions first and that the neutral draft should not be presented until later. The representative of Denmark suggested, however, that both sides should be told in advance of the plan to submit a compromise resolution, since this might help to reduce the length of the debate.

4. The representatives of Australia and Brazil fully reserved the position of their respective governments. Brazil will not sponsor the resolution but is likely to support any moderate text offered by a combination of neutral States. Ends.

Reference: My teletype No. 349 of November 21.

Addressed External No. 360, repeated Washington No. 104.

Following from Johnson, Begins: As agreed on November 21, Moe of Norway, Dr. Patijn and Miss Klompe of the Netherlands and Miss MacCallum met as a working group on the morning of November 22 to prepare a tentative draft resolution on Palestine which might be offered to neutral delegations for their possible sponsorship. The text which emerged from this meeting is given in my next succeeding telegram. It is described as a tentative draft working paper which does not commit any of the delegations represented at this morning's meeting and will not bear their names.

2. Moe, however, will take the initiative in calling a meeting of neutral delegations today to discuss the possibility of using a text along the lines suggested in this working paper as the basis of a compromise resolution on Palestine. He will also take up the question of when a neutral resolution should be introduced. Jessup suggests it might be as well to secure voting priority for any draft resolution by introducing the new draft before either Israel or the Arab States table their proposals. There is some sentiment, however, in favour of waiting until after there has been a confrontation of Arab and Israeli positions, since a neutral resolution brought forward at the outset would draw fire from both sides, whereas a resolution submitted later with a view to reconciling the parties may have more chances of acceptance.

3. As you will note, the purpose of the working paper is to encourage the direct negotiations for which Israel has been asking, but not to do so on the highly selective basis of certain past resolutions of the Security Council which were invoked in the so-called Norwegian draft (i.e., Eban's draft resolution of

Marginal note on this and the following document:

(seen by Mr. Ritchie who approved reply).

October 31 minus the sixth recital of the preamble). The Conciliation Commission is asked to be available, moreover, to assist the parties if so desired.

4. The Israeli delegation has been disappointed that we argued at the meeting of November 21 in favour of the inclusion of a reference to past Assembly resolutions and to the future availability of the Conciliation Commission to help the parties to reach a settlement. In a letter to the Minister, a copy of which is going to you by bag, they explain that the text "drafted by Norway" was the result of consultations with members of the Conciliation Commission and thirteen neutrals, "none of whom" had "failed to see the advantage of the simplicity and freedom of the new start" proposed in the so-called Norwegian draft. The Israeli delegation is apparently assuming that there was a greater degree of support for the formula proposed by Eban than has actually proved to be the case. We did not intervene in the discussion at the meeting of neutrals on November 21 until after Moe, the Chairman, had observed that criticisms voiced by other delegations made it apparent that the so-called Norwegian draft would not do. Our proposals were along lines suggested to us by Crossthwaite and Jessup. We plan to discuss the position with the Israelis today if possible.

5. If Eban does not object violently, the Minister would be prepared to agree that Canada should be one of the sponsors of a draft resolution along the lines proposed in the working paper of November 22. He suggests, however, that the second recital of the preamble should be changed to read "recalling resolutions (not 'the' resolutions) of the General Assembly and the Security Council on Palestine."

6. We will keep you informed of developments but meanwhile should be grateful for your general comments on the question of sponsorship, which is not specifically mentioned in paragraph 13 of the general instructions accompanying the commentary. If the neutrals decide to submit a compromise proposal early in the debate the question will be one of some urgency, since the Palestine question will be taken up on November 25, Saudi Arabia's effort to secure an early discussion of the Eritrean item having failed. If on the contrary the neutrals decide to offer a draft resolution later on in the debate, it may be a week before our decision on sponsorship of a particular text will be required. Ends.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY — PALESTINE ITEMS

Reference: My teletype No. 361 of November 24, 1952.

Addressed External No. 369, repeated Washington No. 109.

The Israeli delegation, which expressed concern about the Canadian intervention during the meeting of neutral delegations on November 21, is now satisfied with the results of that intervention and expressed itself yesterday afternoon as being willing to go along with the neutral states in supporting a draft resolution along the lines of the tentative draft working paper on November 22. They suggested a few minor changes which were discussed at the meeting of neutral delegations held yesterday under the chairmanship of Mr. Moe. Those present at the November 24 meeting were representatives of Norway, the Netherlands, Denmark, Belgium, Uruguay and Canada.

2. My next succeeding teletype gives the text of a proposed draft resolution for which sponsors are now being actively sought among neutral delegations. Belgium will support the resolution but cannot sponsor it. The Netherlands and Denmark may support it if wide enough backing is found for the draft. Mr.

Moe is seeing the representatives of Mexico, Ecuador, Bolivia, the Dominican Republic, Thailand and perhaps others. He tried to get a postponement until Wednesday of the opening of the debate in order that the question of sponsorship might be settled so as to enable the proceedings to begin with the presentation of the neutral resolution. Kyrrou did not agree, however, and this morning we are to have the presentation of the report of Conciliation Commission followed by two Arab speeches. The Arabs will not submit their own draft resolution, however, until after the neutral resolution has been tabled.

3. Neutral delegations are being given until 4 p.m. today, November 25, to decide whether or not they will sponsor the proposed draft resolution. The Minister is inclined to agree to Canadian sponsorship if there is more than one respectable sponsor beside ourselves.

4. Fabregat of Uruguay suggested the inclusion in the resolution of a paragraph inviting the President of the Assembly to try to initiate direct negotiations between the parties. Representatives of the Netherlands and Norway argued that it would be unwise to try to hurry the proposed negotiations in this way, and that what was needed were direct contacts between Egypt and Israel, without the publicity which would be attendant on the convening of meetings by the President of the Assembly. Fabregat may take up with other Latin American delegations the possibility of bringing in a separate resolution on this question. He did not think Uruguay should sponsor a neutral resolution since it is regarded as a consistent advocate of Israeli policies.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY — PALESTINE ITEMS

Addressed External No. 378, repeated Beaver, 114.

Following from Johnson, Begins:

1. At a meeting of neutrals yesterday afternoon decisions to sponsor the neutral draft resolution on Palestine were announced by Norway, the Netherlands, Denmark, Ecuador and ourselves. Uruguay and Costa Rica wished to consult their governments. They will have their names added to the list of sponsors before the draft resolution is tabled in the ad hoc Political Committee this morning if sanction of their governments is received.

2. Yesterday the Arabs were notified of our intentions and their spokesman, Shukairi,<sup>69</sup> was invited to make a statement to the neutrals on the Arab position. Shukairi said that in ordinary circumstances there was a conflict of equal rights, and an appeal by neutrals to negotiate a settlement should receive favourable response from parties. In this case, however, one of the parties has consistently refused to accept as a basis of discussion the recommendations made to it by the Assembly and this will affect the success of the neutrals' effort to reconcile the parties. A copy of the neutral draft resolution was given to Shukairi after the neutrals had made slight amendments and before the draft resolution was handed to the Secretariat.

3. As it now stands, the draft resolution follows in every respect the text contained in my teletype No. 370 of November 25 except that the final para has been divided into two separate parts, with the addition of one phrase in the first of the two parts. The closing section now reads as follows:

"Urges the governments concerned to enter at an early date into direct negotiations for the establishment of such a settlement, and requests the Palestine Conciliation Commission to be available for this purpose if so desired."

The discussion on Palestine in the ad hoc Committee began yesterday morning with the distribution of a supplement to the twelfth progress report of the Conciliation Commission and an announcement by the chairman that the Government of Jordan has appointed Dr. Jamali<sup>70</sup> of Iraq to act as its spokesman.

4. In view of the unusual wording of agenda Item 67, the first speaker was not the chairman of the Conciliation Commission. To a request for a report from the Conciliation Commission, the French chairman of the Commission replied that he would be glad to present a report but would not be able to do so immediately. His statement is expected to be given today.

5. A controversy developed over Jamali's unexpected request for the seating of Dr. Tannous, the representative of Palestinian-Arab refugees. Although Tannous had been heard by the committee in the discussion of assistance to Palestine refugees, the United Kingdom delegate objected that it would be improper to have him make a statement in a purely political debate under agenda Item 67. The United States delegation, which had a few hours' advance warning of Dr. Jamali's intention, had consulted Washington which instructed its delegation to speak and vote against the proposal to seat Tannous, because of the stand the United States delegation would have to take in the First Committee on the seating of representatives of Moroccan and Tunisian nationalists. Jessup argued that members of the committee are representatives of governments and that only in very exceptional cases should the committee depart from the practice of hearing only government representatives. The Arabs maintained that the refugees, being stateless persons, had no government to speak for them. Their accredited representative should, therefore, be heard particularly since Israel had charged that the Arab states are "perpetuating the sufferings of the refugees." On questions of blocked accounts and compensation which the committee would be considering, the representatives of the Arab Governments did not have as precise information as Tannous.

Dr. Mohamed Fadil Al-Jamali, Minister of Foreign Affairs of Iraq; Chairman, Delegation to the Seventh Session of the General Assembly.

6. The Iraq proposal was defeated by 13 votes in favour, 14 opposed (including the United States, the United Kingdom, Canada and the Netherlands), with 20 abstentions. A member of the United Kingdom delegation expressed the view to us after the meeting that if Jamali had consulted other delegations in advance, probably some suitable arrangement could have been made to have Tannous called upon when compensation was under discussion and a need for information at his disposal was actually felt by others on the committee. Arab news agency representatives reported to the United Kingdom delegation that as a result of the vote, evening papers in the Middle East which had been released were carrying headlines "Anglo-American-Israeli conspiracy to wipe out Palestine."

7. This will not help the efforts of the Relief and Works Agency to secure the active cooperation of refugees.

8. A formal speech was made by the Egyptian delegate who developed the thesis that the failure of the Conciliation Commission had been due to its practice of trying to adapt the instructions it has received from the Assembly to situations created by Israel in defiance of the Assembly's wishes.

9. The Mexican delegate made a plea for harmony and a conciliatory spirit in the discussion which was backed up by the chairman. Eban (Israel) said he would try to cooperate. Jamali said it would be necessary in the debate for the Arab delegations to do what they could to offset the general lack of comprehension of the Arab position. Ends.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY — PALESTINE ITEMS

Reference: Our teletype No. 391 of 28th November, 1952.†

Addressed Ottawa No. 399 repeated to Washington No. 118.

The Ad Hoc Political Committee, after its Thanksgiving recess, met this morning only to find that no delegations were prepared to speak. The Arabs were still undecided as to whether or not they should press for a new Palestine commission or content themselves with offering a few amendments to our joint draft resolution. The co-sponsors meanwhile had decided to space out their speeches in support of the joint draft resolution in an attempt to draw together the opposing parties. Thus we did not ask for the floor.

2. The joint draft resolution was presented on November 26th by Moe of Norway after a brief presentation of the reports of the Palestine Conciliation Commission by Ordonneau of France. The only news in Ordonneau's speech which is not already contained in the 12th report of the Conciliation Commission (October 8th, 1952) and the supplement to the 12th report issued on November 24th, was an intimation that Israel has now decided to release blocked accounts up to 500 pounds for each depositor which is somewhat more than it had first intended to release. Moe's presentation of the draft resolution was quiet. He pointed out that there is always a possibility that direct negotiations may succeed but that this cannot happen unless they are actually tried. The armistice agreements call for direct negotiation. If the assembly also makes a similar appeal this may make it easier for the parties to get together. He said the sponsors had tried to make the resolution as neutral as possible.

3. Shukairi replying for Syria in a speech which for him was remarkably moderate, said that wherever a principle had been accepted by Jews and Arabs in advance they had been able to meet together. In the assembly they meet together because they have both subscribed to the charter. At Rhodes they met on the basis of the Security Council resolution of November 16th, 1948, which both sides had accepted. In the armistice commissions Arabs and Israelis are able to sit down together because they both have accepted the armistice agreements. Finally, Arabs and Israelis sat at the same table to discuss the release of frozen assets of refugees once the principle had been accepted. If Israel would now accept past assembly resolutions as a basis for negotiation, a settlement might be reached by direct negotiation even before the present session of the assembly ends. Referring to Jordan's attitude on the status of Jerusalem (where, like Israel, Jordan has opposed the establishment of direct international control), Shukairi said that if a settlement of the refugee question and the boundary issue can be reached, Jordan would withdraw its objections to the internationalization of Jerusalem.

4. Cuba now wishes to join the sponsors and will ask to have the draft resolution revised tomorrow for this purpose. Costa Rica has not yet heard from its government. There is still a possibility that, like Cuba, it may have its name inscribed as a co-sponsor also.

5. The Israeli delegation is lobbying very actively in favour of the draft resolution among delegations which have not yet made up their minds. We are preparing for a possible Arab attempt to have the Conciliation Commission increased to seven members and its terms of reference amended to include a specific obligation to seek a settlement on the basis of past assembly resolutions. Should this happen the British and probably the Americans will help to secure a compromise under which only two members would be added to the present commission, probably neutral states, and the terms of reference so phrased that the Commission will be able to devote its attention to practical questions on which agreement is almost within sight. This would be in line with the recommendation made by the Conciliation Commission in the latter half of paragraph 19 of its 12th progress report.

AD HOC COMMITTEE — PALESTINE

Addressed External No. 400, repeated Beaver No. 119.

We have been discussing with the United Kingdom and the United States delegations the lines along which it may subsequently prove necessary to amend the resolution we are co-sponsoring if it is to get the necessary majority. Opinions are at present divided as to the support which resolution would receive in its present form. Eban of Israel thinks that we are already fairly sure of thirty votes but we are inclined to think that his estimate is optimistic and both the United Kingdom and the United States delegations agree.

2. By Monday, we should have a clearer idea as to the support which our resolution in its present form would receive. If Arab or other amendments are not likely to be strongly supported, there will of course be no occasion to accept them or possible compromise amendments which might then be submitted by the United Kingdom and United States delegations. However, I should think we would have to concede some ground in the direction of the Arab point of view in order to secure a two-thirds majority for our resolution and our aim will therefore be to work with the other co-sponsors and with the United Kingdom and United States delegations for concessions which would command substantial support without alienating the Israeli delegation or sacrificing the central place which our resolution gives to encouraging direct negotiations.

3. As indicated briefly in our telegram under reference, the amendments now being considered by the United Kingdom and United States delegations would be directed to meeting the following two principal points of attack on our resolution which are expected from the Arab side:

(a) Towards enlarging the Palestine Conciliation Commission and extending its terms of reference, and

(b) Towards referring specifically in the operative part of the resolution to direct negotiations<sup>71</sup> of the General Assembly and the Security Council.

On at least one of these points it will probably be necessary for the co-sponsors of the resolution to accept a compromise amendment or amendments. The United States delegation would rather concede something on (a) above and the United Kingdom on (b).

omission?

4. As for the wording of possible concessions on either of these points, the United States delegation thinking has not advanced very [far?] but the following suggestions have been made to the Foreign Office by the United Kingdom delegation:

(a) In place of the final two paragraphs of our resolution, the following might be substituted:

"Calls upon the governments concerned to make an early and genuine effort to compose their differences and make full use of the facilities offered by the Palestine Conciliation Commission which may, if it so desires, co-opt for this purpose two additional members."

(b) The following might be added to paragraph 2 of the operative part: "and bearing in mind United Nations resolutions."

5. The above are very tentative suggestions of the United Kingdom delegation and they have not received comments on them from the Foreign Office.

Addressed External No. 405, repeated Beaver 122.

In the Ad Hoc Committee on the morning of November 29, formal speeches were made by representatives of Lebanon, the US, Uruguay and Honduras.

2. The Lebanese Representative criticized our joint draft resolution on the grounds that it gives no indication of the basis of which direct negotiations may begin. He said the Arabs would be willing to negotiate a settlement if Israel would accept as the starting point for discussion the Lausanne Protocol of May 12, 1949 which still bears the signatures of Israel, the Arab states, the US, France and Turkey. He suggested that two new members should be added to the Conciliation Commission but did not introduce formal amendments to our joint draft resolution. His speech seemed to indicate that Shukairi's impetuous offer in Paris to sit down to negotiate with Israel as soon as Israel accepts past resolutions of the General Assembly as a basis of negotiation is now endorsed by other Arab states. They may even be ready to go a step further so as to narrow down their demands to the acceptance of the "principle" of repatriation of refugees and a territorial division of Palestine which would give the Arabs somewhat more than they now control but not necessarily in the checkerboard pattern suggested by the General Assembly five years ago.

3. Fabregat of Uruguay, arguing in defence of the joint draft resolution, said that the formulation of a basis for negotiation is the "second or third step" and that it would be unnecessary to discuss the agenda for an Arab-Israeli conference until after the states had undertaken to enter into direct negotiations.

4. Dr. Jessup (US) presented a masterly review of the work of the Conciliation Commission since its establishment in January 1949. He pointed out that the signing of the Lausanne Protocol had enabled the Commission to get from both parties an expression of their views. The gap between the parties had proved too wide for the Commission to bridge under its terms of reference. It became clear as time went on that little progress was possible unless the parties were willing to meet for direct discussions. The Commission, therefore, had proposed mixed committees to consider specific questions. When this attempt failed, the Commission had made further efforts to establish areas of agreement between the parties. In 1951 it tried the experiment of offering proposals of substance on the basis of which an enduring settlement might be reached. It expected the parties to put forward counter-proposals in the true spirit of negotiation. None were forthcoming, however, and the Commission was thus disappointed in its efforts to encourage the parties to follow traditional procedures. Jessup reinforced his plea for direct negotiations by referring to what Dulles had said at Paris during the Third Session of the General Assembly shortly before the adoption of the resolution on December 11, 1948. Dulles had gathered from listening to the statements of the parties to the dispute that they themselves did not wish the Assembly to shape a settlement but only to facilitate agreement through conciliation. Neither of the parties, however, had shown any disposition since then to negotiate in the ordinary sense of the word, either directly or indirectly. Since the Sixth Session of the Assembly the parties have not asked the Commission for any assistance although the Commission has been always accessible and willing to make its facilities available to them.

5. The representative of Honduras offered to support the joint draft resolution, particularly if the second recital of the preamble may be understood as recalling the resolutions of November 29, 1947 and December 11, 1948 and as a reaffirmation of the Assembly's support for an international regime in Jerusalem which would safeguard the Holy places. Honduras would be willing to have the Conciliation Commission strengthened as Lebanon suggested.

6. When the list of speakers closed at 1 o'clock there were 29 names inscribed. Israel, Syria, Saudi Arabia and three Latin American States will speak ahead of the Canadian delegation. Other sponsors will follow later in the debate. It was announced at this morning's meeting that Cuba would be included among the sponsors.

7. Eban challenged the right of the delegate of Iraq to speak for Jordan. Jamali explained that to avoid confusion he would speak for Jordan only when he was sitting in the seat reserved for the official observer of Jordan. Whenever he did so someone else would occupy the position of chief spokesman for Iraq. The chairman reminded the committee that no objection had been raised when he had first notified the committee of Jamali's appointment as the authorized spokesman of Jordan. Since no support was forthcoming for Eban's objection, Kyrrou assumed it was the wish of the committee to acquiesce in the request of the Government of Jordan.

8. At a meeting of the sponsors of the joint draft resolution which was held immediately after the Ad Hoc Political Committee rose, Eban outlined in confidence the suggestions for a permanent settlement which he intends to make public on December 1. These will include arrangements for security (guarantees of non-aggression and procedures for terminating boundary incidents), territorial arrangements which, among other things, will eliminate demilitarized zones, the opening up of transportation and communications, with rationalization of regulations regarding airports, harbours, free ports and border crossings; and agreements for economic development, particularly in relation to water conservation and irrigation. There was no reference to refugees. Eban said it would be helpful to him if he could assure his government that the neutrals would not accept any Arab amendment of their resolution which would relate direct negotiations specifically to the terms of past Assembly resolutions or which would increase the size of the Conciliation Commission. After Eban withdrew it was decided unanimously that the first guarantee for which he had asked could be given but that if an amendment calling for the addition of two new members to the Conciliation Commission made it possible for the Arabs to accept the joint draft resolution, the neutrals should not bind themselves in advance to reject the proposal. Before Eban's withdrawal, Patijn of the Netherlands suggested to him that if he could say anything about the possibility of even a token repatriation of refugees within certain accepted categories it might strengthen Israel's position. If this was impossible perhaps he might consider the inclusion in his speech of some words of genuine sympathy for the refugees.

9. Our first intervention in the debate late on Monday, or perhaps on Tuesday, is likely to be brief and non-controversial.

Addressed Ottawa No. 411, repeated Washington No. 123.

In the Ad Hoc Political Committee there was distributed this morning a revised edition of the joint draft resolution on the Palestine Conciliation Commission in which the name of Cuba was added to the list of sponsors. The committee learned that Panama also wishes to be a co-sponsor and a second revised edition will accordingly be issued to-day.

2. We are sending you by bag a copy of a speech in which Eban developed for an hour and fifty minutes this morning the possibility of direct negotiations with a view to settling the Palestine dispute in a series of treaties and agreements on various individual questions. He argued that even if the parties cannot achieve a settlement immediately, it is still their duty to make the attempt. He pointed out that the present situation is governed by the armistice agreements and went on to say that no arrangements for revision of these agreements can have validity except by mutual consent.

3. Eban argued that there was no logic in the attitude that states A and B cannot reach a settlement except through negotiations with states C, D and E. The negotiations should be direct and unfettered. This position is in marked contrast to the line taken by the Jewish Agency in 1947 when the United Kingdom Government was pressing for direct agreement between the disputants as the basis for a decision on the future government of Palestine.

4. Referring to the invocation of past Assembly resolutions by the Arab states Eban observed that the Arab states appeared to be in the habit of asking for implementation of United Nations resolutions only after their application had become impossible in practice. It was because past Assembly resolutions had not in fact brought about a settlement that the question was still before the Assembly.

5. In response to the appeal made by a member of the Netherlands delegation in the meeting of neutrals on Saturday afternoon, Eban included a passage relating to refugees in his outline of a peace settlement Israel would be willing to accept. In addition to supporting the Blandford Plan for the reintegration of refugees he suggested that if the Arab states and Israel discussed international assistance to refugees, they might be able to make joint proposals on the subject to the United Nations. He re-affirmed, on behalf of his government, the principle of compensation for abandoned refugee property but pointed out that Israel's capacity to pay compensation was adversely affected by the Arab blockade. He referred to the re-uniting of certain refugee families in the past and to Israel's recent decision to take over responsibility for the relief of 19,000 Arab refugees and to release blocked accounts of refugees in Israeli banks.

6. Under the heading of security, Eban proposed the inclusion of a non-aggression clause in the peace treaties and recognition of the territorial integrity of each state. There should also be a reasonable limitation of military budgets. The provision of arms supplies from abroad might then be considered in relation to the legitimate needs of the area as a whole. In connection with the territorial settlement, he proposed the reuniting of border villages with their lands and the elimination of demilitarized zones. The demilitarized areas on the frontier between Israel and Syria, where Israel has proceeded with drainage operations in violation of the armistice agreement, must have been particularly in the mind of the speaker, since Israel is anxious to be in complete control of the region in order to complete its development plans. Perhaps the deepest impression made on the Committee by the representative of Israel was in the passages in which he outlined the possibilities of economic and scientific co-operation and co-operation in the field of transportation, communication, technical assistance and research. He concluded by asserting that bilateral agreements reached by Israel and each of its Arab neighbours ought not to encroach on the interests of third states or on the interests of the International Community in the Holy Land. The negotiations should begin with an agreed agenda in which should be included the proposals of both parties.

7. The delegate of Syria filled in the time until adjournment with a rambling extempore reply. On adjournment the Arabs met in caucus to try once more to reach agreement on the policy they will follow. They have not yet tabled either a separate resolution or amendments to our draft resolution.

8. We are likely to speak to-morrow. A draft statement which has the Minister's approval, and of which we are sending you copies in the next bag, picks up the argument where Jessup and Eban left off. We refer to Jessup's comment that the Conciliation Commission had been disappointed to find that the parties, while failing to accept the proposals of the Commission, had not put forward counter proposals of their own which might serve as the basis of negotiation in the accepted sense of the term. We go on to suggest that Israel's statement to-day may be regarded as embodying a series of counter proposals. Another new development has been the confirmation by several Arab states of Syria's first offer in January 1952 to enter into direct negotiations with Israel as soon as the latter accepts past resolutions of the Assembly as a point of departure. We suggest that the next step may be for the Arabs to state which resolutions of the United Nations organs and which articles of these resolutions they would prefer to use as a starting point for direct negotiations since there is room for a certain choice among the various approaches made to the Palestine problem at different sessions of the General Assembly and Security Council in the past. We close with a reference to the importance of the meaning we attach to the term "negotiations" and state that what the sponsors of the draft resolution have in mind are negotiations in the accepted sense of the term in which there develops, after the initial statement of the positions of the parties, a process of genuine give and take.

AD HOC COMMITTEE — PALESTINE

Reference: Our telegram No. 439 of December 3.

Addressed External No. 449 repeated Beaver No. 134.

Following from Johnson, Begins: As we have been heavily involved in negotiating with other delegations on amendments to our draft resolution, we have been relying on the United Nations teleprinter to keep you up to date on the proceedings of the Ad Hoc Committee yesterday and today, December 4. As you will have seen, three groups of amendments were submitted this morning by Chile, by Peru, and by Colombia, Costa Rica, El Salvador, Haiti and Honduras collectively. In this message, I shall report chiefly on what has been going on behind the scenes.

2. As soon as Professor Bokhari<sup>72</sup> introduced the Pakistan-Afghan-Iranian-Indonesian resolution yesterday (our telegram No. 436 of December 3), we realized that we might be moving into a situation in which, although both our resolution and the Pakistan resolution might pass in committee, neither might get the two-thirds majority which will in all probability be needed in plenary. As Bokhari lost no time in suggesting to us and to several others privately that a marriage of the two resolutions might be possible, and in view of the Chairman's appeal this morning to those delegations which now have resolutions or amendments before the committee to get together, we have been seeking to work out with friendly delegations an acceptable resolution which would have a fair chance of gaining a two-thirds majority.

3. We therefore met informally yesterday afternoon with Moe and Dons of Norway, Anderson of Denmark and Ralph Bunche of the Secretariat, whom Moe had invited to attend. Led by Bunche and Moe, this group revised the operative part of our resolution so as to incorporate ideas and a few phrases from the Pakistan resolution. We agreed from the beginning that it was going to be impossible to achieve the purpose we have set ourselves if we were to incorporate the principal feature of the Pakistan resolution, which is the reaffirmation of the resolution passed by the General Assembly at its last session (Resolution 512).<sup>73</sup> To accept this would in our opinion destroy the "fresh start" which we are seeking to make in urging direct negotiations, now that both sides are showing less unwillingness to come together to discuss a settlement. For Resolution 512 urged the implementation of previous assembly resolutions, and the Israelis would not agree to reaffirm it this year.

4. The results of this group's work were incorporated in the revised draft of the operative part of our resolution agreed to by the delegations of the United States, United Kingdom, France and Turkey late yesterday. The text of their further revisions was sent to you in our telegram under reference. The sponsors group had decided at our meeting yesterday afternoon that it would be preferable for any further amendments to be introduced by the United States, the United Kingdom, France and Turkey but these delegations were very reluctant to take the initiative because of their direct interests in the area and because they felt that much valuable time would be gained at this stage in the debate if a revised draft of the resolution were to be introduced by the sponsors themselves. The sponsors were also considering the possibility of asking Mexico to sponsor the revisions but for the reasons given above and also because we found that Mexico had some detailed and not too suitable amendments of its own in mind, we decided that it was preferable to ask Mexico to support the sponsors' revision in place of its own.

5. This afternoon, the sponsoring group met to consider what points from the Pakistan resolution and the Latin American amendments could be accepted by the sponsors without undermining our objective of bringing the parties together for direct negotiations in which they would determine their own agenda. The result of this afternoon's work is a draft revision of the sponsors' resolution, the text of which is given in our immediately following message. We hope to be able to table it sometime tomorrow if final approval is given by the delegations of Uruguay, Panama and Ecuador. However, we may not be able to submit the full text of our revised draft as the United Kingdom and United States delegations do not want to yield to the Arabs on increasing the membership of the Palestine Conciliation Commission unless this is sufficient bait to persuade the Arabs to vote for our resolution or at least abstain. When Dons of Norway, acting on behalf of Moe as chairman of the sponsors group, gave a copy of our revised draft to Shukairi of Syria late this afternoon, Shukairi was not particularly enthusiastic and held out no hope of the Arabs being prepared to vote for such a resolution, although he thought they might possibly decide to abstain. If we cannot get assurances from the Arabs that they will not oppose our revised draft, the sponsors will probably submit the draft with the paragraph expanding the Palestine Conciliation Commission deleted.

6. The sponsors have also given copies of the revised draft to Bokhari of Pakistan and Eban of Israel. Bokhari told me that he personally would not object to our revision which incorporated some of his points but he could not predict what the Arabs would decide to do. As he will be leaving for Karachi on Saturday, he will probably not have time to do much missionary work among the Arabs even if he were more enthusiastic about the revision than I think he is.

7. Dons has approached Eban but I do not yet know the Israeli reaction. There will clearly be points in our revision which Eban will not like although I cannot see anything to which they could legitimately take serious exception. We have held the line on the two fundamentals of (a) Direct negotiations, and (b) No explicit reaffirmation of previous Assembly resolutions as the basis for direct negotiations. I should therefore think that Israel should come around to supporting our revised text especially if we can convince them that without the revision we shall have little hope of gaining a two-thirds majority because we shall not have sufficient support from the Latin American delegations.

8. To press this point home to them we shall tell them that at this afternoon's meeting, Ribas of Cuba said he thought that unless we accepted some of the ideas in the Latin American amendments and the Pakistan resolution, only half a dozen Latin delegations would support our resolution. He used this argument to urge us to accept the only part of the Chilean resolution which we have so far not accepted as we think it would also blur the basis of negotiations unnecessarily. However, as opinions on this point are divided among the sponsors and as it may prove necessary to accept something of the kind in order to round up a sufficient number of Latin votes, it is possible we may in the end agree. The amendment in question would add to operative paragraph 3 in our present draft resolution (urging direct negotiations) the following words:

"It being understood that due consideration must be given in such negotiations to the fundamental principles contained in United Nations resolutions on Palestine and its problems."

9. As you can see, the situation is now reaching a point at which, if we get agreement from the Arabs to support or abstain on our revised draft, we might come to a vote by Saturday morning or Monday. The United States and United Kingdom delegations have agreed to speak as soon as they can to Shukairi and other leading Arabs, and to Eban, with a view to gaining their support or at least their toleration of the revised draft which, as we have pointed out to the United States and United Kingdom delegations, is in large measure their inspiration and about half their actual drafting. If we run into very heavy weather with both sides and the United States and United Kingdom representations are ineffective, the sponsors may have to consider whether it would be worth while trying to amend our resolution further. I hope and believe it will not come to that, but I do not wish to give you the impression from anything I have said earlier that we anticipate an easy passage for our revision. Our main motive in attempting one has been the realization that Israel's estimates of support had been grossly exaggerated particularly insofar as the Latin delegations were concerned and that if we did not attempt an immediate revision, the result might well be that no resolution would emerge from this year's discussion on Palestine. As the committee's debate has shown that both sides were now closer to direct negotiations on a realistic basis than they have been since the armistice agreements were signed, the sponsors have felt obliged to take certain risks in the interests of bringing the parties together.

10. Incidentally, the two additional members for the Palestine Conciliation Commission at present being considered by the United States, United Kingdom, France and Turkey are Sweden and Mexico. There is however some doubt as to whether Sweden would be prepared, in view of sad memories, to serve. Ends.

When the Ad Hoc Political Committee met this morning, we found that the United States delegation had been unable to secure an undertaking from the Arabs to abstain on the revised joint draft resolution contained in my telegram under reference. The sponsors, therefore, withheld their revised draft and concentrated on efforts to secure a greater measure of support from delegations which had offered amendments.

2. At the close of the morning session Kyrou asked that an effort be made in two stages to harmonize the various proposals submitted to the committee. He proposed that the sponsors of the eight-Power draft resolution should meet first with the delegations which had offered amendments and thereafter with the sponsors of the four-Power draft resolution introduced by Bokhari in the hope of securing a single draft which would be generally acceptable.

3. What emerged from the first of these two meetings was the discovery that:

(a) Costa Rica and El Salvador maintained the position that direct negotiations between the parties to the Palestine dispute should be held "within the framework of the previous General Assembly resolutions concerning Palestine;"

(b) Peru maintained its position that there should be some reference to the jurisdiction of the United Nations under the previous resolutions relating to the Palestine problem;

(c) Chile was not inclined to agree to the revised draft unless the para. calling for direct negotiations included the words "it being understood that due consideration shall be given in these negotiations to the fundamental principles contained in United Nations resolutions relating to Palestine and its problems."

4. The Chilean representative explained that it was not the full text of past United Nations resolution which he was concerned about but the application of their "basic principles." He had in mind particularly guarantees from the parties for the protection of the holy places and to restore to the Arabs that part of Palestine in which the Arab population is concentrated. After the Latin American sponsors of various amendments had withdrawn, the representative of Uruguay undertook, as one of the sponsors of the eight-Power resolution, to see if he could not persuade the delegations of Costa Rica, El Salvador, Chile and Peru to accept the draft resolution as given in my telegram under reference.

5. Representatives of Pakistan and Iran explained that they would insist on paras 1 and 7 of the four-Power draft resolution. If we could accept these, they would give up the paras asking that the headquarters of the Conciliation Commission should be in Jerusalem and that the membership of the commission should be increased to five. They urged us to accept the second para of the amendment proposed by Costa Rica, El Salvador and their associates, to which reference is made in para 3(a) above.

6. After the delegate of Uruguay had been called away to make a speech in the plenary meeting, the remaining sponsors of the eight-Power draft resolution discussed the possibility of amending operative para. 4 to read as follows: "urges the governments concerned to enter at an early date into direct negotiations for the establishment of such a settlement, bearing in mind previous resolutions of the United Nations and the religious interests of third parties." It had been explained by Latin American delegates that although they would have preferred the original plan for direct United Nations control over the city of Jerusalem as a corpus separatum they would be willing to settle for appropriate assurances from Jordan and Israel that the religious interests in the two countries would be properly respected.

7. When these developments were reported to Eban he said that if an innocuous phrase could be found about the protection of religious interests he would be willing to consider it. The members of the Palestine Conciliation Commission are a little afraid a proposed revision of operative para. 4 might have the effect of reopening the entire discussion, but at our suggestion the United States delegation will see if something can be done at this stage to get a representative meeting of the Arabs with a view to clinching the few concessions they already seem willing to make and persuading them to take the final step that is required if we are to have general agreement on the form of this year's resolution.

Addressed External No. 478 (Important) repeated Washington No. 147.

On Saturday morning Jamali (Iraq) and Shukairi (Syria) made kind references in committee to our statement of December 2.<sup>74</sup> Although they could not go along with all of it they appreciated the attempt to preserve a fair balance and thought this was a right approach.

2. Shakairi answered the questions which I had put to the Arabs in para. 10 of my statement in the hope of eliciting something from them that might be useful in bridging the gap between the parties. Instead of continuing to insist on implementation of all fifty-four of the United Nations resolutions on Palestine the Arabs have now narrowed the choice down to the original partition resolution (181 (II)) and para. 11 of resolution (194 (III)) on treatment of refugees. Part of the vagueness in Arab claims regarding implementation of "all" past resolution has thus been disposed of, we hope.

3. Negotiations between the co-sponsors of the eight-Power draft resolution and the Latin Americans who had proposed amendments to it continued through part of Saturday morning. We expect final agreement with the Latin Americans this morning in return for a text which recalls "the existing resolutions of the General Assembly" in the second recital of the preamble and asks in the fourth operative para. for "direct negotiations..... bearing in mind the principal objectives of the United Nations in the Palestine question and the religious interests of third parties." The last phrase had been strongly urged upon all concerned by the Belgian delegation with French support.

4. At noon on Saturday the United States, United Kingdom and French delegations agreed to support this text. The Turkish delegation consulted its government.

5. Early Saturday afternoon Jessup of the United States delegation talked over this proposed text with the Arabs. The reaction was uncompromisingly negative. The Arabs are still smarting from Llewellyn's<sup>75</sup> speech in which he argued against repatriation of Arab refugees and suggested that the longer the Arabs put off a peace settlement the less likelihood there was of getting any adjustment of the situation in their favour on the basis of past assembly resolutions. They are also disappointed over the prospective loss of Latin American support.

6. Although the Egyptian representative in private took a more moderate position than the other Arabs, Jamali said at the meeting with Jessup that the Arabs would fight against the proposed draft resolution "both here and in the Middle East." He also said they might ask to have item 67 removed from the agenda. If he carries out this threat Kyrou will say

- (a) That this is a matter which the committee cannot decide,
- (b) That he will refer it to the President of the Assembly,
- (c) That discussion of item 68 will be deferred until the fate of item 67 has been decided, and
- (d) The committee will pass to the question of new members.

7. We spent the week-end considering how to stave off the threatened breakdown. This morning at ten the eight co-sponsors are meeting to finalize the agreement on the text of the revised draft resolution. Moe will then introduce it in the Ad Hoc Political Committee, and we hope the Latin Americans will withdraw their various amendments. We plan to speak next ourselves in order to put to the Israeli delegation a question or two which will enable Eban to make a conciliatory reply. Rafael has agreed, and telephoned Eban in Washington about yesterday. If Eban's speech is as conciliatory as we hope it will be the atmosphere may possibly be more conducive to harmony than would have been the case if these preliminaries had not been arranged. We will inform you immediately if the proposal to withdraw item 67 from the agenda is actually pressed by the Arabs.

AD HOC COMMITTEE — PALESTINE

Reference: Our teletype No. 478 of December 8th.

Addressed Ottawa No. 481, repeated Washington No. 149.

This morning December 8th, before the Ad Hoc Committee meeting, the sponsors decided on the final text of our revised resolution. We agreed on the revisions forecast in paragraph 3 of our teletype under reference on the understanding with the Latin delegations which had submitted amendments that they would withdraw them.

2. When the Committee met, Moe, on behalf of the sponsors, introduced the revised text of our resolution, explaining in detail the origins of the compromise language which we had adopted in an effort to meet Latin amendments and some of the points in the Asian resolution. Moe actually followed the text of the statement we had prepared on Saturday on the assumption that the Ad Hoc and First Committees were going to be meeting simultaneously on Monday and that Moe would be unable to speak for the sponsors.

3. Johnson supplemented Moe's remarks by pointing out that a certain measure of conciliation between the Arab and Israeli delegations had already been achieved in the course of the debate. On the one hand, Israel had submitted what were in effect counter proposals to the 1951 peace plan of the Conciliation Commission and, on the other, the Arabs had, in reply to our questions, narrowed down from 54 to 2 the General Assembly resolutions which mattered to them as a basis for direct negotiations. We went on to express the hope that as a next step Israel might be able to clarify what, it seemed to us, was a misunderstanding on the part of a number of Asian delegations who seemed, from their earlier statements, to be under the misapprehension that Israel was "brushing aside" all previous resolutions. We asked them whether within the context of paragraph 4 of the revised 8-Power draft resolution there was anything further they would like to add to make it easier for direct negotiations to begin.

4. Eban replied at once that he supported the revised text submitted by the sponsors; but he did not unfortunately make the kind of conciliatory statement, either in tone or comment, which we thought he had planned to make. Although the Canadian question and the Israeli reply were meant to appear spontaneous, we had, in fact, been in touch with Eban's delegation yesterday evening. This morning before the meeting we had read them the full text of this part of our statement, and it was our understanding that they had thought that such a statement would give Eban a useful opportunity to reply in a way which would improve the atmosphere in this Committee and relieve some of the tension caused by the Arabs' sense of indignation at the by-passing of previous resolutions which Eban's earlier statement had implied. Eban's plane from Washington was so delayed, however, that he had only hurried conversations with his associates before the meeting began. All he did in his statement was to reaffirm his earlier proposals in rather stiff terms.

5. Shukairi, then pointed out to the Committee that Eban had not answered our question, which I think Shukairi might have also misunderstood. He went on to analyse the revised draft resolution, point by point. His main concern seemed to be that the sponsors had omitted from this text the phrase "in conformity with United Nations resolutions" which had appeared in previous resolutions as applied to any appeal for a settlement of outstanding differences between the parties. His criticism of our revision was highly negative and left no doubt that the Arabs will vote against our resolution unless they succeed in amending it.

6. At the request of Jamali of Iraq and after a vain attempt to use for a discussion of Eritrea a night meeting which had been scheduled for Monday, the Committee decided to postpone the voting until tomorrow.

7. The Arabs met this afternoon. We understand indirectly that they have been considering whether to submit amendments to our resolution, now that they find we have, to their extreme annoyance, won the Latin American delegations over to our side, or whether they should withdraw their item altogether. If they attempt to withdraw their item, they would probably need a two-thirds vote of the Assembly to take it off the agenda. This would not only create a bad precedent for others who may find themselves getting the worst of an argument they have started, but it might also have the effect of prolonging the Palestine debate still further, as the Israelis have undertaken to withdraw their Palestine item (the next on the Committee's agenda) only on condition that our resolution is passed. Jessup, we understand, is inclined to let the Arabs withdraw their item, as it is now clear that our resolution will not materially advance the prospects of direct negotiations. Naturally, the Israelis are strongly opposed to this and opinions among the sponsoring delegations seem to be divided.

8. As for amendments, we shall, I think, have to vote against further attempts to water down the principle of direct negotiations from as nearly as possible a fresh start. There is really no basis which we can now see for reaching an agreement with the Arabs who once again have come to the point of being prepared to discuss amendments too late in the course of our discussion of the Palestine item.

9. Copies of our statement in the Committee this morning are being sent to you by bag this evening<sup>76</sup> and the revised text of our resolution is attached to the United Nations Division's copy of the Canadian statement.<sup>77</sup>

AD HOC COMMITTEE — PALESTINE

Addressed Ottawa No. 493, repeated Washington No. 152.

The discussion yesterday morning, December 9th, was confused by the continuing uncertainty as to exactly what the Arabs intended to do. By process of question and answer, rehearsed in advance under United Kingdom coaching, Jamali made it plain that what the Arabs wanted was to have both Palestine items withdrawn, preferably by the sponsors of both resolutions withdrawing them. The sponsors did not agree to withdraw their resolution but thought that the proper way to proceed would be for the Arabs to move formally the withdrawal of the item.

2. Eban, however, immediately took the position that in that case the Israeli item on Palestine which comes next on our agenda would stand and he clearly intended to have the same debate over again possibly on the same resolution if the Arabs succeeded in having their item withdrawn.

3. Eban at the same time made a more satisfactory reply to the Canadian question asked on December 8th (our telegram under reference) and specifically accepted the sponsors' paragraph 4, saying that although the details of specific United Nations resolutions often became unimplementable with time, the principal objectives remained and other ways of implementing them more appropriate in present circumstances could be found by direct negotiations.

4. Johnson thanked Eban and, in a statement for which the Israelis were grateful, said that he thought that our question had been answered. The text of our brief statement is being sent to you by bag.+

5. The Mexican delegate, Quintanilla, then proposed adjournment until tomorrow and threw in the suggestion that both sides might be able to find common ground if the words "the resolutions of the United Nations and" were added in paragraph 4 after the words "bearing in mind". The proposal to adjourn was discussed for an hour until it was time to adjourn anyway.

6. The private talks which followed during the rest of the day focused on the Mexican compromise proposal. We managed to get the Israeli delegation to give us private assurances that they would not oppose the amended resolution if we could get a similar undertaking from the Arabs. Although some of the Arabs were, in private, prepared to agree with this proposition, they decided at their afternoon meeting that they would withdraw the item and not commit themselves to anything else. In fact, Shukairi specifically said that they would oppose the Mexican amendment and the resolution as amended.

7. In this situation, the sponsors met with the United States, United Kingdom and French delegations in the late afternoon and at the suggestion of Jessup, it was more or less agreed that the time had come when we should no longer be trying to negotiate with both sides but we should take our individual positions on the Mexican amendment. He said that for his part he hoped that it would gain a very good majority because he thought it was a fair and reasonable proposition which brought the resolution into better balance and might be more productive of the direct negotiations we all desired. Some of the sponsors however did not wish to commit themselves to accept the Mexican amendment, not knowing what position the Arabs and Israel would in the end adopt. The sponsors will therefore not be able to accept the Mexican amendment formally but the Committee will proceed to vote on it. It will without doubt be accepted and increase the support for the amended resolution. We hope to come to the vote today if, as we expect, the Arab motion for withdrawal of the item is defeated.

AD HOC POLITICAL COMMITTEE — PALESTINE

Addressed External Ottawa No. 512 repeated Beaver Washington No. 155.

Following from Johnson, Begins: Yesterday, December 10th, the debate on paragraph 4 of the 8-power draft resolution was confused at the outset by the discovery that the interpreters on the preceding day in translating the remarks of the Mexican delegate had given the impression to those who were using the English, French and Russian translations that Quintanilla had suggested the adoption of the words "bearing in mind the resolutions as well as the principal objectives of the United Nations". The phrase he had used in Spanish meant, however, "taking into account", which Quintanilla as well as many others considered to have greater force than the phrase "bearing in mind".

2. Just before the afternoon meeting on December 10th, Eban met the 8 sponsors to say that although he would agree to accept the phrase "bearing in mind the resolutions as well as the principal objectives of the United Nations" he would not go so far as to accept the phrase "taking into account the resolutions." Because several of the 8 co-sponsors had said earlier that they would accept no further amendments unless, Israel agreed, it was decided not to go all the way suggested by Quintanilla.

3. When the afternoon session began, since the Chairman of the group of co-sponsors had to leave for Norway, I spoke accepting the inclusion of the words "the resolutions as well as" immediately after the words "bearing in mind" in paragraph 4 of the joint draft resolution. The Mexican representative said he would be obliged to abstain because we had not agreed to change the words "bearing in mind" to "taking into account". The delegate of El Salvador made a similar statement.

4. The delegate of Turkey explained that he would have to abstain because his government saw no point in adopting a resolution asking for direct negotiations over the opposition of one of the parties called upon to negotiate.

5. The representative of Syria tried to stave off the vote by proposing that a request should be made to the International Court of Justice for advisory opinions on four questions relating to the rights of Palestine Arab refugees and the right of the representatives of states to negotiate with Israel on behalf of refugees who are not citizens of those states.

6. During the reception given by the President of the Assembly immediately after the Ad Hoc Political Committee rose, Jamali of Iraq told Jessup of the United States that the Arab states would abstain on the 8-power draft resolution if the Mexican formula was adopted. Kyrrou suggested to Jessup that perhaps an attempt might be made in the plenary meeting to get an arrangement of this sort.

7. In the meeting this morning no formal suggestion was made to change the wording of the revised 8-power draft. There were a number of explanations of forthcoming votes. The Egyptian representative stated that his government would "never enter into direct negotiations with Israel until the Government of Israel declares its readiness to respect United Nations resolutions." This declaration caused a commotion in the Israeli delegation, which throughout the whole debate on the Palestine item has been counting heavily on the co-operation of Egypt if the Assembly asks for direct negotiations without reaffirming its own past resolutions.

8. Shukairi attempted to have his resolution calling for a request for advisory opinions from the International Court of Justice voted upon first. His motion was defeated by a vote of 13 in favour, 21 (including Canada) against, and 24 abstentions. The voting on the 8-power draft resolution was conducted in three parts, with a roll call vote taken only on paragraph 4. The vote on the draft resolution to the end of paragraph 3 was 34 in favour (including Canada), 11 against and 9 abstentions. In the roll call vote on paragraph 4 there were 31 in favour (including Canada) 14 against and 13 abstentions. Paragraphs 5 to 7 were adopted by a vote of 35 in favour (including Canada), 16 against and 3 abstentions. The resolution as a whole was passed by 32 in favour (including Canada) 13 against and 13 abstentions. Those voting against were the sponsors of the 4-power draft resolution, the six Arab states and India, Thailand and Ethiopia. The states abstaining were Argentina, Belgium, China, El Salvador, Greece, Mexico, Peru, Turkey and the Soviet bloc.

9. The Syrian proposals to refer four specific questions to the International Court of Justice for advisory opinions were defeated by a vote of 13 in favour, 26 (including Canada) against and 19 abstentions.

10. It may be significant that the representative of the Soviet Union, in explaining his vote on the Syrian proposal, went a step further than usual in giving comfort to the Arab delegations. He referred not only to the American-Israeli conspiracy to undermine the security of the Middle East but said also that no matter what advisory opinions the International Court might give, past resolutions of the General Assembly still retained their validity.

11. The delegate of Israel, in explaining his vote on the 8-power resolution, then made fully as conciliatory a statement as we had hoped to elicit from him on December 8. He said the adoption of the resolution recommending normal procedures would bring the states together in an atmosphere of good will. He pointed out that the resolution would not confer privileges on either party but laid on his country and others a heavy responsibility for seeking patiently a satisfactory settlement of outstanding issues. Ends.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY — PALESTINE

Reference: My telegram No. 512 of December 11.

Following from Johnson, Begins: Since the vote was taken in the Ad Hoc Political Committee on December 11 approving the 8-power draft resolution which recommends that the parties to the Palestine dispute should enter into direct negotiations "bearing in mind the resolutions as well as the principle objectives of the United Nations on the Palestine question, including the religious interests of third parties," the United Kingdom delegation has been receiving telegrams from the Middle East which have disturbed the minds of several members of the delegation. They have indicated to us increasing concern about the effect on Middle East defence planning of a draft resolution in which the assembly is asked to reverse its attitude on the rights of refugees, the territorial division of Palestine, and international supervision for the Holy Places.

2. This concern, which has grown every day since the vote was taken, came to a head this morning with the publication in the New York Times of a delayed press interview in which the Prime Minister of Israel, Mr. Ben Gurion restated his position on December 7 in clear terms:

(a) Israel would exclude all Arab refugees but build up its Jewish population to four million within ten years;

(b) No territorial concessions would be made beyond minor adjustments and exchanges of pieces of land to straighten out the frontier;

(c) No negotiations would be undertaken on the status of Jerusalem;

(d) Development of neighbouring Arab states would be impossible without the aid of Israeli experts, which is the very thing the Arab states have always feared most since they assume it would mean permanent economic domination of Arab countries by Israel.

3. This morning at a meeting attended by United States and United Kingdom representatives and two members of the Canadian delegation, the situation was reviewed. It was agreed that the publication of the statements attributed to Mr. Ben-Gurion would probably affect the vote in plenary on Tuesday afternoon and make the initiation of direct talks more difficult. The statement would be regarded as tantamount to a declaration that peace must be established on Israel's terms. Some of the Latin American states may, consequently, have to change their affirmative votes to abstentions although there may also be some shifts from abstentions to affirmative votes. The United Kingdom may also abstain. The Arab states have been lobbying actively. Shukairi appealed to me directly to change the phrase "bearing in mind" to "in conformity with". When I asked him if he would be able to accept or abstain if the phrase "taking into account" were used, he said all of the Arab states would have to vote against it.

4. The United States delegation does not seem to share fully the apprehensions of the United Kingdom representatives. It takes the view that the Arab states were bound to dislike a draft resolution calling on them to accept a more realistic appraisal of what they can get by way of a peace settlement. Barco still maintains that the time has come when this must be made clear to them. Jessup, however, is turning over in his mind the possibility of finding an Asian delegation to propose the substitution of the phrase "taking into account" for "bearing in mind". The change might not affect the assembly vote appreciably but it might facilitate the initiating of direct negotiations after the first Arab reaction has had time to spend itself.

5. The co-sponsors of the 8-power draft resolution seemed divided in their private views last week on the Mexican proposal to use the phrase "taking into account". Now that the draft resolution has been adopted by the Ad Hoc Political Committee it has ceased to be the property of the eight co-sponsors, who presumably have recovered their freedom of action. We are not taking any initiative in pressing for the Mexican amendment ourselves but did make it clear to the United States and United Kingdom delegations that we wish to know what importance they attribute to the strong reaction in the Middle East to the Ad Hoc Political Committee's decision. The Minister feels that there is not much difference between the Mexican proposal and our own phrase, and if it is thought that the adoption of Quintanilla's phrase will make it easier for direct negotiations to begin, we should of course support it, although we are not in a position to propose the amendment ourselves. Ends.

1. At yesterday afternoon's plenary meeting the delegate of Iraq moved that a discussion should be held on the report of the Ad Hoc Political Committee on the work of the Palestine Conciliation Commission. This motion received more than the necessary vote of one-third (16 in favour, 9 against, with 20 abstaining, including Canada, the United Kingdom and the United States).

2. The Palestine question was not reached in yesterday's plenary but will come up at tonight's meeting.

3. The United Kingdom has decided to vote in favour of the resolution adopted by the Ad Hoc Political Committee. On explanation of vote the United Kingdom delegate expects to say that the phrase "bearing in mind" is not the equivalent of "disregarding" and it is understood that Eban will reply for Israel undertaking not to lose sight of past resolutions of the United Nations.

4. The Government of Israel has considered it wise to issue a supplementary statement on its attitude toward the Holy Places. This was distributed to members yesterday afternoon. It is in effect an affirmation that "reverent regard" for religious interests of third parties will continue to characterize Israel's policy. Whether or not a statement as vague as this will affect Latin American votes still remains to be seen.

Following from Johnson, Begins: Although the question of Palestine was not reached in the plenary meeting last night, an amendment by the Philippines to paragraph 4 of the draft resolution on Palestine was distributed. The Philippine amendment asks for the substitution of the words "on the basis of" for "bearing in mind". It also asks for the addition, at the end of paragraph 4 of the words "and, in particular, the principle of the internationalization of Jerusalem."

The United States and the United Kingdom delegations are inclined to vote against both parts of this amendment. The Netherlands and Norway took the same view last evening but the Chilean delegate told us that he and other Latin American representatives would find it very difficult to vote against the second part of the amendment.

Our delegation is discussing this morning with the Minister the question of whether Canada should vote against both parts of the amendment or abstain on the second part. Ends.

Addressed External No. 574, repeated Beaver 172.

Following from Johnson, Begins: After consulting the Minister yesterday morning, December 18, on the line to be taken in voting on the Philippine amendment to paragraph 4 of the draft resolution on Palestine, I made a brief intervention explaining the Canadian vote.

2. Since the Philippine amendment was to be considered in two parts it was possible for us to vote against the first part, the purpose of which was to tie the Arab-Israeli negotiations more closely to past resolutions of the United Nations, while abstaining on the second part, which invoked the principle of the internationalization of Jerusalem. In my intervention I said that the Canadian Government "has always maintained and still maintains, that international supervision of the Holy Places should be established." I went on to explain that if the second part of the Philippine amendment were generally understood in this sense, we should have been able to vote for it. The phrase used in the Philippine amendment, however, had come to be closely associated with a particular plan for Jerusalem which had been found to be inoperable. It was for this reason that we were obliged to abstain in the vote on the use of this phrase. I repeated, however, that the Government of Canada continues to favour the principle of international supervision of the Holy Places.

3. The full text of my statement goes to you separately by bag.†

4. At a supper party at the home of Gideon Rafael last evening, Mr. Lourie told Miss MacCallum that the new Israeli Ambassador to Tokyo passing through Manila had seen government officials, who expressed dissatisfaction because the delegate of the Philippines had been absent when the vote on Palestine was taken in the Ad Hoc Political Committee on December 11. The Israeli Ambassador was assured that the vote of the Philippines in the plenary would be cast in favour of the 8-power draft resolution. A circular dispatch which reached the new Papal Nuncio in Manila about the same time, however, expressed the dissatisfaction of the Vatican with the form of reference in paragraph 4 of the draft resolution to the "religious interests of third parties." A call from the Papal Nuncio resulted in instructions from Manila to the Philippine representative here to introduce an amendment invoking directly the principle of the internationalization of Jerusalem. Lopez acted without consulting any Latin American delegations, but some of the latter had also received communications from their governments concerning the attitude taken by the Vatican to paragraph 4 of the draft resolution.

5. The vote on this part of the Philippine amendment was 28 in favour and 20 against, with 12 abstentions including our own, thus failing to win a two-thirds majority. This is the second defeat suffered in the General Assembly for the principle of direct international control over the Jerusalem area. It was apparently more decisive than the vote of December 15, 1950, when there were 30 votes in favour, 18 against and 9 abstentions, including that of Canada. In yesterday's vote Belgium, Yugoslavia and Ethiopia supported the principle of internationalization, along with 13 Latin American States and 12 members of the Arab-Asian group. The Soviet bloc, the United States, the United Kingdom, Turkey, most of the co-sponsors of the draft resolution, New Zealand, Panama, Uruguay and Israel voted against this part of the amendment. France, Australia, Greece and a scattering of Latin American States abstained along with ourselves.

6. Israel renews its offer to accept international supervision of the Holy Places but maintains that yesterday's vote will permit the removal of the Foreign Office without further delay from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem. It is believed that without the intervention of the Philippines there would have been a clear two-thirds majority for the draft resolution asking the parties to bear in mind the religious interests of third parties.

7. The vote on the first part of the Philippine amendment was closer (26-24-10). Turkey and several Latin American States joined the Arab-Asian bloc in supporting the demand that peace negotiations should be based on United Nations resolutions. Canada and the other co-sponsors of the draft resolution voted against the amendment, along with the United States, United Kingdom, France, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, several Latin American States and the Soviet bloc. After the defeat of both parts of the Philippine amendment the draft resolution recommended by the Ad Hoc Political Committee was also rejected for lack of a two-thirds majority. The vote was as follows:

For — 24 including Canada and all the eight co-sponsors, the United States, the United Kingdom and France.

Against — 21 including the Arab-Asian bloc and the Soviet bloc. Abstentions — 15 including Turkey, Greece, the Philippines, Belgium and a few Latin American States.

8. Jessup, in an explanation of vote shortly before the vote was taken, made a plea to the Arab States in which he stressed the fact that paragraph 4 of the draft resolution involved no surrender or impairment of their rights and no casting aside of past resolutions of the General Assembly. This statement may be quoted to good effect in retrospective discussions of yesterday's events but it had no immediate effect on the tension from which Arab delegations were suffering. Zafrullah Khan said that in order to regain some respect for United Nations resolutions in the Middle East what the Assembly should do was to insist that a State which owes its very existence to resolutions of the General Assembly should conform with those resolutions. Eban developed the theme of Israel's reverent regard for the Holy Places and asked that discussions of his government's policy should be based not on journalists' accounts of what they believed Mr. Ben-Gurion may have said at a luncheon but by the official statements made to organs of the United Nations by Israel's accredited representatives. Shukairi argued that the statements attributed to Mr. Ben-Gurion in the New York Times article of December 15, coincided fully with official statements made by Israeli representatives to the United Nations. After the vote, in a highly emotional speech, he thanked the Asian, African, Latin American and Soviet delegates which had helped to defeat the draft resolution. He also thanked the United States, the United Kingdom and France for having supported in 1948 the principle of repatriation of refugees and the internationalization of Jerusalem.

9. Eban then took the rostrum to point out that the Assembly had rebuked the initiative taken by the six Arab States which had inscribed the Palestine item on the agenda. It was clear that the Assembly would not object if peace negotiations were undertaken on terms which did not impose on Middle Eastern Governments the provisions of past Assembly resolutions which have been "overtaken by events". He clearly hoped that the Palestine issue would not be taken up in the Assembly again and believed that Israel has at last succeeded in escaping from the political jurisdiction of the General Assembly.

10. Yesterday's vote was a tactical defeat for the co-sponsors of the 8-power draft resolution as well as a defeat for the Israeli delegation, which had asked for our help in getting the Arabs to enter into direct negotiations with representatives of Israel. It was also a tactical defeat for the United States and United Kingdom delegations, which had urged us at various times to resist pressure to have past Assembly resolutions reaffirmed. But this tactical defeat may have the practical effect of hastening the peace negotiations we desire, since the satisfaction the Arabs have derived from the rejection of the draft resolution has put them in a less resentful mood.

11. During the discussions last week about what we should do regarding the Mexican compromise proposal, which would have placed greater emphasis on past Assembly resolutions, we ourselves were rather more concerned than some of our colleagues in other delegations about what the Soviet bloc would do. We feared that after abstaining in committee its members might vote against the draft resolution in the plenary, thus posing as the true friends of the Arab refugees and the champions of past United Nations resolutions. DeJany of Saudi Arabia had mentioned this possibility to us. He did not relish the prospect, since the refugees already constitute a serious security risk and a sharp swing toward the Soviet Union would create fresh problems for Arab governments. The harm done by the actual vote of the Soviet bloc will be partially offset, however, by the fact that they did not support the first part of the Philippine amendment and by the consideration that they are not likely to follow through with contributions to the Relief and Works Agency, while the United States and United Kingdom are likely to continue their substantial financial support of Arab refugees. The situation, however, is not entirely without danger. Ends.

Dear Mr. Pearson:

I write to convey my Government's thanks for the efforts made by the Canadian Delegation, so brilliantly represented by Ambassador Johnson and Mrs. McCallum, to advance the cause of a negotiated peace, between Israel and the Arab states. A clear consensus of majority opinion developed in favour of the thesis which Canada so eloquently upheld. Despite the lack of any formal action by the General Assembly, the moral weight of its majority opinion was unmistakably expressed.

It may well be that the refusal of the General Assembly for the first time in nearly six years to adopt a Resolution on the "Palestine Question" symbolizes the desire of the United Nations to see the governments of the area themselves adjust their differences by direct relationship and contact. Thus the Assembly over which you have presided may come to be regarded as a constructive turning point in the pacification of the Near East.

With best wishes for Christmas and the New Year,

Yours very sincerely,

ABBA EBAN

UNITED NATIONS SECRETARIAT DISMISSALS — HOUSE CLEANING OR WITCH HUNT?

Reference: Our letter No. 644 of May 26.†

1. I suppose it is not surprising that during an election year in the United States, the United Nations should come in for more than its normal quota of abuse as "a nest of communists" which the "soft" United States Administration is supporting. The recent hearings of a Federal Grand Jury in New York, coupled with the continuation of hearings in Washington by the McCarran Committee of the Senate and the House Committee on Unamerican Activities, have focused public attention on the testimony of several American citizens who are, or have been until recently, members of the United Nations Secretariat. The Bricker and Vorys resolutions in Congress and many other private resolutions such as those passed this spring by the Daughters of the American Revolution, testify to the evidently wide-spread belief in the United States that the United Nations should "clean house".

2. Since the Korean war broke out, this is what Mr. Lie has gradually been doing. The latest batch of seven dismissals in as many weeks has, however, had its reaction not only in the Secretariat but outside the United Nations as well, and at his press conference on June 6, Mr. Lie was peppered with questions which reflected a certain uneasiness as to the basis of the policy of the Secretary General in dismissing employees on security grounds.

3. At his press conference Mr. Lie maintained his previous stand that the United Nations does not discharge communists on its staff because they are communists. The contracts of certain members of the Secretariat had recently been terminated, Mr. Lie said "in the best interests of the United Nations." He would not amplify on that statement, but said he reserved for himself the right to judge each case on its merits and the right to make his decision without giving his reasons. A copy of the report of the press conference in the New York Times of June 7 is attached.†

4. I think you are already sufficiently familiar with the background. Last summer and fall the Delegation supplied you with full documentation on the five appeals of dismissed employees to the Administrative Tribunal, the fight which then developed between the Administrative Tribunal and the Secretary General over the two cases — generally considered the weakest — whom the Administrative Tribunal recommended should be reinstated or indemnified, and the decision of the General Assembly at its last session to strengthen the hand of the Secretary General by amending the Staff Regulations. This decision, which was taken with the support of the Canadian Delegation, gave Mr. Lie authority to dismiss non-permanent employees without necessarily giving a reason (Article 9 of the Revised Staff Regulations of the United Nations adopted by the General Assembly on February 2 — Resolution 590 (VI)).

5. In analyzing the cases of the seven United States citizens who have been dismissed in recent weeks, it is extremely difficult to sort out fact from rumour. This is a subject which members of the Delegation must approach with great caution and we have therefore discussed it with only a few members of the Secretariat whom we knew well and whose judgment and discretion we trusted. They themselves have had the same difficulty in establishing the facts because the matter had been dealt with in the Secretariat by a very few people — Mr. Lie and Mr. Byron Price being the principal ones concerned. I have not yet spoken to either Mr. Lie or Mr. Price but if I get a suitable informal opportunity shortly I intend to ask them what the facts are.

9. Members of the Secretariat cannot help comparing Mr. Lie's dismissals during the past year with the much more moderate and cautious policy which he had previously pursued.

11. I suppose that in practice the problem really only arises for the Secretary General when he has information that a national of one of the western countries has communist sympathies and may be regarded as subversive from the point of view of his government. It is not, he feels, "in the best interests of the United Nations" to keep on its staff Americans who may be thought by influential members of Congress to be tainted, if not dangerous. In terms of good internal administration, the Secretary General is, I know, anxious to have as few communists as possible on the Secretariat who are not nationals of a communist country. I can see that, from the point of view of western delegations, it is more likely to promote good security if we can assume, when we are speaking to a member of the Secretariat whom we know is from a western country, that he will not be reporting to the Soviet Delegation, as we must assume is the case with members of the Secretariat from Soviet and satellite countries. There is, nevertheless, no constitutional reason whatever, either in the Charter or the Staff Regulations or in any resolution of a United Nations body, to justify the Secretary General of the United Nations in dismissing any employee because he is a communist. Article 100 of the Charter and the Oath of Office of employees of the Secretariat (paragraph 1.9 of the Staff Regulations) say only that, as international civil servants, members of the Secretariat should have "the interests of the United Nations only in view," and should not "seek or accept instructions ... from any government or other authority ... ." In dismissing western members of the Secretariat because they are (from the point of view, say, of the F.B.I.) "poor security risks," the Secretary-General must therefore maintain that he is acting solely "in the best interests of the United Nations," and that, officially, it is a coincidence that the dismissed employee happens to be a communist.

12. The whole issue of the Secretary General's dismissals is, I am afraid, likely to become more rather than less acute in coming months. We understand on good authority that there are some twenty to thirty "doubtful" cases pending. If a proportion of these cases are dismissed, and particularly if Mr. David Weintraub is forced to resign, there will in all probability have to be a major show-down at the next General Assembly — and this, we firmly believe, should if possible be avoided.

17. I have gone into this question in some detail not only because I think the matter of principle is important but because the Secretary General is at present in the process of having a large proportion of his temporary staff contracts reviewed. In accordance with the mandate of the last General Assembly, the status of some 1150 temporary staff with over two years service is to be determined during the next two years with the assistance of an independent five man Selection Committee under the chairmanship of Mr. F.P. Walters, former Deputy Secretary General of the League of Nations. The Walters Committee is evidently intended by the Secretary General more as a means of sorting out inefficient staff members than a means of screening doubtful security cases. These, we understand, Mr. Lie and Mr. Byron Price intend to deal with themselves. During the coming years of the Walters Committee's review, the whole subject of staff contracts is likely to remain in a state of flux.

18. At present a member of the Secretariat who is dismissed may appeal to the Joint Appeals Board established as a joint body with equal representation of U.N. administration and Staff Committee. From this body a further appeal is possible to the Administrative Tribunal which was set up by the General Assembly in 1950 in order to have some independent and final board of review outside the Secretariat. In practice, however, the effect of the revision of the Staff Regulations in Paris has been to give the Secretary General virtually a free hand in dealing with security cases, as in practice neither the internal Appeals Board nor the external Administrative Tribunal now feel they can decide on cases in which they realize that it may not be possible to give them all the relevant facts for reasons of security. In recent months, there have in fact been no appeals in security cases. We have heard indirectly, from a leading member on the staff side of the Joint Appeals Board, that they have virtually decided to leave security cases alone; as the Secretary General is no longer required to give reasons, there is nothing for the Board to review. Thus the Secretary General has now almost unlimited power and the employee almost no recourse against the decision of the Secretary General to dismiss him on security grounds.

19. If the Secretariat and those delegations which are interested in these matters felt that adequate procedure for handling appeals and reviewing administrative decisions in security cases existed, a large part of their doubts and misgivings would be eliminated. . . . Perhaps what is needed is something comparable to the Security Panel in Ottawa. But the history of the Administrative Tribunal in the past year has shown the difficulty of relying on its inexperienced and sometimes prejudiced members to carry out such a function impartially.

20. We are, it seems to me, faced with an uncomfortable dilemma. If we are prepared to admit to ourselves, United Nations regulations and resolutions notwithstanding, that the U.N. Secretariat should not harbour, for example, an American citizen who is known to have taken part in espionage for the Soviet Union, then we may have to reconcile ourselves to leaving the Secretary General very wide discretionary powers. Any independent body set up with authority to review such cases would have to do so in accordance with United Nations regulations and resolutions and could not be expected to take account of secret evidence presented by, say, the F.B.I. Some people would go even further and say that as any known communist might be used for subversive activities by the Soviet Delegation, all known communists from western countries should be dismissed. Indeed, the extreme position in this direction is that anyone regarded as a political liability to the Organization should not be carried on its staff, particularly if his presence is prejudicial to United States support for the Organization.

21. On the other hand, it is possible to take the position based on the Charter and on the resolutions of the General Assembly that the United Nations cannot discriminate in this way and that provided a communist is not known to be violating his oath as an international civil servant, he, should not be touched. From this point of view, it might well be desirable to strengthen the hand of the Administrative Tribunal and the Joint Appeals Board so that they might effectively review security as well as other cases.

22. When the revision of the Staff Regulations was being discussed in Paris, the Canadian Delegation, among others, supported the extensive powers which the Assembly gave to Mr. Lie partly because we trust Mr. Lie and believe the solemn assurances which he gave to the Assembly that he would exercise his powers with the greatest care and restraint. On the basis of these assurances, I think we should continue to support Mr. Lie. But it is possible that he may need support not only against attacks from outside but against pressures from within the Secretariat. As Assistant Secretary General for Administrative and Financial Services, Mr. Byron Price takes the initiative in the current house cleaning. Unless he is restrained effectively by Mr. Lie, many of those who know Mr. Price best think that he may go too far. Yet he is in a very strong position because he is supported by many influential people in Washington and if he were to resign on a house cleaning issue (as he threatened to do last September) it would do considerable harm to the United Nations in the United States. By letting Mr. Lie know that we are taking an interest in what is happening in the Secretariat, I think we can make him feel that he would not be alone in maintaining a cautious and reasonable policy, free from any taint of McCarthyism. For the fear of McCarthyism in the Secretariat could not only sap morale and efficiency but could very well warp the impartial character of reports drafted by the Secretariat.

23. Though Mr. Lie is perhaps unduly sensitive to personal criticism or anything he might regard as "disloyalty" among his staff, I believe he would not willingly or easily yield to pressure from any government to have a member of the U.N. Secretariat dismissed on security grounds. Moreover, I am inclined to doubt that there has been any direct pressure from the United States Government, though I should not be surprised if Mr. Price had access to F.B.I. information. It is possible, however, that Mr. Lie may feel that the mood of Congress and public opinion in the United States require him to eliminate American communists from the Secretariat "in the best interests of the United Nations." He has the power to do so. But he will have to exercise his power with care and restraint if he is to avoid criticism. Public opinion in the United States is, happily, not the only yardstick of what is "in the best interests of the United Nations."

CANADIAN POLICY REGARDING

...

Canadian Support for the Secretary-General against United States Interference

10. You will recall that Mr. Lie indicated to our Permanent Delegation last June that he was worried about the action of United States' Grand Juries and other United States bodies in respect of United Nations employees and was planning to seek United Kingdom and French support in upholding the rights of the United Nations in the United States. The Secretariat have not raised this question with the Delegation since that time but it may well come up in informal discussions before United Nations staff matters are discussed in the Fifth Committee. It would appear to me that we should support the Secretary-General in any case where the United States authorities have obviously attempted to investigate the activities of a United Nations' employee while working as a member of the Secretariat. The difficulty here, of course, is where the line should be drawn since it would seem difficult to criticize investigations by United States authorities insofar as such investigations are conducted with a view to protecting the security of the United States. It would seem reasonable to suggest, however, that the Secretary-General should not be required to submit evidence to United States authorities regarding the normal working activities of a member of his staff, nor should he be required to release confidential information concerning the character or record of such individuals. Although it is difficult to decide in advance what our course of action should be on any one case or group of cases, I should be glad to know whether you agree that we should endeavour to lend the Secretary-General our moral if not our official support in his dealings with the United States authorities on this question.<sup>78</sup>

UNITED NATIONS SECRETARIAT

As you are fully aware, the whole question of U.N. personnel policy has become the subject of public controversy and is rapidly assuming proportions which may have an important, if not decisive, influence on the calibre of the Secretariat and even, possibly, on the future status of the Organization.

2. Contributing substantially to the prevailing atmosphere of "crisis" has been allegations of "Communist penetration" into the Secretariat. Although these allegations reached their zenith during the recent Presidential campaign, they are continuing as a result of press and public interest in the activities of the Grand Jury and the McCarran Sub-Committee, as well as recent statements by Senator Wiley. However, it would be wrong to assume that an adverse press in the United States is the only or even, necessarily, the most important factor. Closely connected in a very complex and confused situation are a number of other issues including:

Sydney Pollock, International Relations Division, Department of Finance.

(a) drastic changes in the United Nations salary, allowance and leave system following adoption of the Fleming Report by the Fifth Session of the General Assembly;

(b) a recent report and statement by Mr. Lie criticizing judgments of the Administrative Tribunal and requesting "clarification" of the Tribunal's "competence"; this statement has been interpreted by some members of the Secretariat as an expression of Administration intentions to eliminate or substantially curtail the "right of appeal";

(c) approval by the Sixth Assembly of the Permanent Staff Regulation and the consequential establishment of the Walters Committee, which is now reviewing the competence and entitlement of each staff member to a permanent contract.

3. I would hesitate to burden you with a memorandum attempting to cover the background and details of each of these issues. I know that you are already familiar with some of them as a result of recent despatches from Ottawa. You may also have seen the attached clippings from the Sunday Times including a featured story by Rosenthal and a legal opinion by a United States trial lawyer† which throw considerable light on these matters.

4. For your immediate purposes, I think it might suffice to let you know that, if you are speaking to members of the Secretariat, you will probably be confronted with queries or references to some or all of the above questions.

5. The probable conclusions to be drawn from these references might include the following:

(a) there is a real concern among the Secretariat, including some senior members, that the "international character" of the staff may be prejudiced if pressure, direct or indirect, from individual member states (including the "host country") is accepted as a basis for selection and maintenance of the staff;

(b) apart altogether from interpretation of the proper relationship of member states to the Organization in selection of personnel, there is a substantial and vocal segment of the Secretariat (including some senior officials) who would contend that the Administration is pursuing personnel policies which are not conducive to the development of a competent and confident international civil service with high morale.

6. In an effort to bring together all parts of this complex picture, Mr. Johnson accepted my suggestion (two weeks ago) that we establish a small working group within the Delegation. Members of this group included Senator Isnor (while he was here), Messrs. Johnson, Leger, Scott, Burbridge, George and myself. Following our meetings Mr. Martin was briefed.

7. At our first meeting it was agreed that the first task was to assemble all available information both on the major issues to be decided and the attitudes of other delegations and the Secretariat. In order to ensure proper coordination of our efforts, I was charged with the primary responsibility of gathering and collating the information.

8. Last evening I was able to suggest that we meet again to review the information I had obtained and to consider an appropriate course of action.

Senator Isnor was not available but Mr. Martin attended, along with other members of the working group.

9. In brief, the results of my investigations and the tentative conclusions reached by the working group were as follows:

(a) a "full-dress" debate in the Fifth Committee during the dying stages of the session would likely be confused, uncoordinated and unconstructive. At best it would probably be indecisive and unlikely to deal thoroughly and comprehensively with the fundamental issues involved. At worst it would be excitable, inflammatory and upsetting — a perfect "propaganda" vehicle for those member states anxious to embarrass Mr. Lie and the "host" country and an ideal forum for rhetoric and demagoguery. In the present "supercharged" state of U.S. public opinion and the low morale of the staff this would be highly undesirable;

(b) the Jurists' Report suggests, essentially, that the Secretary-General has adequate authority, indeed the responsibility, under the Charter and the present staff regulations to deal with the question of "disloyal" staff members;

(c) the Secretary-General has already tendered his resignation and the new Administration will take over in Washington shortly after the New Year. It may be an optimistic assumption, but at least we can be hopeful, that as the election campaign fades into the background, and Eisenhower and Brownell take over in Washington (with Lodge at the United Nations) there will be a greater willingness in Washington to attempt to restrain tendentious and critical attacks on the United Nations;

(d) complex questions of international law are raised by the Jurists' Report. Responsible member states would not wish to express final opinions on these issues before they have received the considered advice of their qualified legal and political authorities at home;

(e) therefore, it would be unwise to precipitate a "full-dress" debate before Christmas. A further period of preparation would permit the development of more mature attitudes and might contribute to a more orderly, judicious and authoritative discussion later;

(f) while seeking to avoid a full debate at this stage it is recognized that some discussion is unavoidable before the Christmas adjournment. A number of delegations, including such delegations as Norway, the Netherlands, Egypt, Uruguay, and the United States have already made statements in private and in the Fifth Committee indicating their belief that the important issues involved must not be permitted to go by default. Behind these declarations are a variety of motives ranging from the contention by Senator Wiley that the Secretary-General should "clean house more quickly," to the statements of other delegations that there are aspects of the Jurists' Report which offend their "concepts of justice and sound personnel administration." In this connection, I was informed that the Swedish Minister of Justice was here last week and was very critical of many of the opinions of the Jurists;

(g) although these delegations contend that some discussion is necessary, they agree, that it would be unwise and premature to attempt to deal exhaustively with this question before Christmas. They would consider it desirable to have brief exploratory discussions at this session which would be limited to a reference to the fundamental importance of the whole question. For that reason delegations should have more time for careful preparation and consultation. In this way there would be a better guarantee that sound policies would ultimately be evolved.

10. In view of the likelihood of a debate, it was suggested that the Canadian delegation should be prepared to speak and to emphasize all or most of the following considerations:<sup>80</sup>

(a) It should underline the need for maintaining and bolstering the international character of the staff. While recognizing the legitimate claims of the "host country" and eliminating undesirable sources of friction the Secretary-General should, at the same time, safeguard the interests of the staff and the Organization.

(b) It should emphasize the common interests of all countries in strengthening and improving the United Nations as an instrument for international cooperation.

(c) While the Jurists' Report is helpful and timely it raises a number of questions which require careful consideration. Since it is only an advisory opinion it should be examined carefully before it is endorsed by the General Assembly.

(d) While the Secretary-General must continue to discharge his full responsibilities, precipitate action should be avoided which might in any way prejudice sound and acceptable long-term policies.

(e) Member states should take advantage of the Christmas recess to give careful consideration to all aspects of this question and return to the next session of the General Assembly ready to give thorough consideration to the whole question.

11. If this general approach is accepted we should take advantage of the recess to consult with other delegations. We should also consider whether a direct approach should be made (individually or in concert with other States) to Eisenhower and Brownell in Washington to develop procedures intended to meet legitimate American claims while avoiding further exacerbation of American public opinion.

12. In the event that delegations are not willing to adjourn discussion until the Spring session, we might contemplate support for establishment of a representative sub-committee which might meet in New York during January and February to explore the issues involved and prepare recommendations.

13. In view of the important political over-tones it would seem desirable to have top-ranking political representation in the Canadian chair in the Fifth

Committee when this matter is under discussion. Mr. Martin has already been fully briefed and has signified a personal interest. However, if he finds that his other duties make it impossible to attend, perhaps the Permanent Canadian Representative could take the chair since he will be required to take any action that may be required while the Assembly is not in session.<sup>81</sup>

14. I understand that some or all of the above ideas have already been brought to your attention.

15. However, the working group felt that they should be summarized in order to enable you to indicate agreement or disagreement in detail with any or all of the above suggestions.

16. As yet there is no certainty as to the exact date on which this question may be dealt with in the Fifth Committee. However, there is a possibility that it may arise as early as tomorrow, December 13. If it does I believe that a number of delegations will be in much the same position as the Canadian Delegation and will request adjournment until early next week to permit their delegations to consider an appropriate course of action.

The panel of jurists appointed by the Secretary-General to advise him regarding staff matters submitted its report during the first week in December. In brief, the panel of jurists has advised the Secretary-General as follows:

(1) Refusal of an employee to answer questions on whether he is or has been engaged in espionage or other subversive activities in the United States is sufficient reason for the Secretary-General to terminate the employee's employment;

(2) Refusal of an employee to answer questions as to whether he is or has been at any time a member of the Communist Party or of some other subversive organization is sufficient reason for the Secretary-General to terminate his employment;

(3) If the Secretary-General is satisfied that he has reasonable ground for believing that a member of the staff is engaging or is likely to engage in activities regarded as subversive by the host country, he should conclude that the officer concerned should no longer be employed in that country;

(4) That the advice given applies to all members of the Secretariat who are not citizens of the Soviet bloc countries.

The Secretary-General has intimated that he is now basing his personnel policy on the recommendations of the three jurists and his dismissal of several employees who had refused to answer questions put by the Senate Internal Security Sub-Committee seems to bear out this fact.

2. The Egyptian and Swedish delegates enquired in the Fifth Committee concerning possible discussion of the jurists' report at the present session. After consultation with the President of the Assembly and the Secretary-General, General Romulo, the Fifth Committee chairman, suggested that it would not be advisable to discuss the matter in the Committee at the present time. He pointed out that the findings of the Administrative Tribunal would have an important bearing on discussions, that the Secretary-General was planning to present a comprehensive report to member states in the near future and that, in any event, more time would be required to allow a careful examination of the implications of the report by the governments of member states. Several delegations expressed doubt regarding the validity of the jurists' findings but all delegations seemed to agree that discussion should be delayed, at least until the second part of the seventh session, in order to allow sufficient time to consider the contents of the report. Mr. Paul Martin, supporting this view, said also that the Canadian Delegation's position should not be construed to mean that it was prepared to accept the jurists' report. Until such time as the Assembly considered the matter more fully, the Secretary-General should be guided by the Charter and the staff regulations. The plenary session, at its meeting on December 18, approved a motion to include in the agenda of the present session of the General Assembly the item "Report of the Secretary on Personnel Policy."

3. In connection with the discussions in the Fifth Committee on this matter, I think it is interesting to note Mr. Lie's statement in which he pointed out that if any delegation had wanted to help or advise him in this difficult situation, there had been ample opportunity during the past few months. Mr. Lie also said that he was proposing to set up a panel of senior United Nations officials — a step which had been recommended by the jurists — to examine each case and that he had approached Mr. Pearson with a view to obtaining two independent jurists who could alternate as chairman of the panel. . . . Mr. Pearson has, however, discussed this matter by telephone with Mr. Ritchie and has indicated that action on this aspect of the problem should be delayed until his return to Ottawa.

POLICY GUIDANCE FOR THE CANADIAN DELEGATION TO THE UNITED NATIONS ON THE QUESTION OF RACE CONFLICT IN SOUTH AFRICA<sup>83</sup>

India has obtained the support of the other 12 Arab and Asian countries in the United Nations and the item which India alone was going to sponsor "Race Conflict in South Africa Resulting from the Policies of Apartheid of the Government of the Union of South Africa" is now on the U.N. supplementary provisional agenda under the sponsorship of all 13 Arab-Asian countries. It is believed that Ethiopia, Liberia, Thailand, some Latin-American countries and possibly the Soviet bloc will support the Arab-Asian item. If this is the case, there will be a majority of U.N. members voting for the inclusion of the question on the final agenda.

I attach an article on this subject which has been prepared for the guidance of the Canadian Delegation. It suggests the following course of action:

1. (a) The Canadian Delegation might let other delegations know in informal discussions that the inclusion of this item on the final agenda would cause us embarrassment; but our Delegation should not otherwise oppose its inclusion on the agenda.

(b) Also in informal discussions, our Delegation might let other delegations know that, should the item be placed on the final agenda, we would hope to have it referred to the International Court of Justice for an advisory opinion on the law, i.e. the scope of essential domestic jurisdiction (Article 2 (7) of the Charter) and the facts of race conflict.

2. When the General Assembly votes on whether or not this item is to be included on its final agenda, the Canadian Delegation should abstain on the vote.

3. If the item is placed on the final agenda, it will cause bitter debates. Nothing would be gained by our Delegation taking part in them.

4. If a resolution is proposed referring the question to the International Court, our Delegation should support it.

5. If a vote on an Indian or an Arab-Asian resolution expressing disapproval of South Africa's apartheid policy cannot be avoided, the Canadian Delegation should support such a resolution if it is put in reasonable terms. The main reasons for doing so are as follows:

(a) While Canada has consistently advocated a reference to the International Court on a somewhat similar item, the Treatment of Indians in South Africa, our reason for supporting a reference to the Court on the Race Conflict item is somewhat different. In the former case, there was uncertainty about the status of the so-called "international" agreements between India and South Africa; also, as Mr. St. Laurent said in his speech of November 25, 1946, we believed the dispute came within "an area of doubt". On the other hand, it is suggested that the item on Race Conflict in South Africa, is not wholly in "an area of doubt"; rather the apartheid policy which has caused race conflict comes very close to the category described by Mr. St. Laurent as "a flagrant violation of elementary human rights". Our principal reason therefore, for supporting a resolution to the International Court on the Race Conflict issue is to delay and possibly prevent bitter discussion on the merits of the question.

(b) Canada will give offense to some member of the Commonwealth whatever course it follows; a vote for the resolution will offend South Africa; a vote against the resolution will offend Pakistan and India. By abstaining, we are allowing the belief to grow among the coloured races that in any conflict between white and coloured peoples, the white nations will always stand together. If the merits of the question are discussed, South Africa may again boycott the U.N. meetings and may possibly withdraw from the United Nations; on the other hand, if all Commonwealth countries vote against or abstain on the resolution, India may interpret these votes as a preference for an all-white Commonwealth and may consider withdrawing from it.

(c) If there is to be a choice, it is suggested that even on purely strategic grounds the friendly neutrality of the coloured half of the world is more desirable and necessary than the support of two million white people in South Africa if a preponderance of force is to be created and preserved against the Soviet Union.

Therefore, if a vote on the substance of the question Race Conflict in South Africa cannot be avoided, I recommend that the policy outlined above be followed since I think it is the best for the circumstances. However, the wording of any resolution disapproving of South Africa's apartheid policy should be carefully examined by the Canadian Delegation before voting for it to make sure that it gives no unnecessary offense to South Africa.

UNITED NATIONS; CANADIAN DELEGATION; POLICY RE APARTHEID RESOLUTIONS

6. The Prime Minister recalled that, when discussing the instructions to be given the Canadian delegation to the current General Assembly of the United Nations, Cabinet on October 9th had agreed that the delegation should abstain on any vote as to whether the question of race conflict in South Africa should be included on the official agenda; that it should support a resolution, if proposed, to refer the question to the international court; and that if a vote on an Indian or Arab-Asian resolution expressing disapproval of South Africa's apartheid policy could not be avoided, the delegation should support it if it were in reasonable terms.

The question had now arisen in New York as to the stand our delegation should take on a resolution recently introduced by the Indian delegate on the subject. This resolution was in very broad terms and called for the establishment of a United Nations Commission "to study and examine the international aspects and implications of the racial situation in the Union of South Africa in the light of the purposes and principles of the Charter and the resolutions of the United Nations on racial persecution and discrimination, and to report its findings to the Eighth Regular Session of the General Assembly."

Although the resolution was rather mild in tone it nonetheless implied condemnation of South African policy in this matter.

7. The Minister of National Health and Welfare said he understood the United States would support the Indian resolution and that the United Kingdom would not. Unfortunately, the general atmosphere prevalent at the United Nations did not lend itself to objective and impartial consideration of the South African problem. Delegates from Iron Curtain countries were taking full advantage of the situation in an attempt to create internal conflict amongst the western democracies. On balance, he was rather inclined to the view that the Canadian delegation should simply abstain on the Indian resolution.

He further reported that South Africa itself was sponsoring a resolution which questioned the competence of the United Nations to deal with apartheid. If this latter resolution were considered on its merits alone, he thought that the Canadian delegation might well vote against it. However, negative action by a majority of delegates on the South African resolution might have implications which would be highly embarrassing to France in respect of the Tunisian and Moroccan problem. It was a delicate question of judgment as to which course of action was the most desirable.

8. Mr. St. Laurent said that presumably the Canadian delegation could vote against the South African resolution but in that case it would no doubt be advisable to make a statement to the effect that Canada did not in any manner wish to prejudice the issue by its negative vote but simply to allow the United Nations an opportunity to determine whether or not the apartheid problem in South Africa was more than a domestic issue. On the other hand, it could be argued that it might be preferable to abstain from voting on the grounds that the resolution was too general.

It was extremely difficult at this distance to judge accurately all the circumstances surrounding this particular problem. He thought accordingly, that the Canadian delegation to the United Nations should be instructed again to use the Cabinet decision of October 9th as a general guide and that if it appeared desirable to take any action which departed from the general policy so outlined, the matter should be referred to Ottawa for consideration and decision.

9. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted the reports by the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Health and Welfare on various United Nations resolutions respecting the race conflict in South Africa and agreed that the Canadian delegation should be guided by the general policy set out in the Cabinet decision of October 9th; it being understood that, if it was felt desirable in any instance to take action which departed from that general policy, the matter should be referred to Ottawa for consideration and decision.

AD HOC COMMITTEE — RACE CONFLICT IN SOUTH AFRICA (ITEM 66)

This item presented the Canadian Delegation with some very difficult decisions, both legal and political.

2. The South African defence was based entirely on the incompetence of the General Assembly, under Article 2(7) of the Charter, to intervene in its apartheid policies which it maintained were essentially within its domestic jurisdiction. The South African case was very skillfully handled by Mr. Jooste who argued that, as there was no question of a threat to the peace or of applying enforcement measures, Article 2(7) could only be interpreted as meaning that the Assembly was not competent to consider the question in any way whatsoever. He submitted a resolution to this effect as soon as the

Assembly had decided, despite his arguments, to inscribe the question on its agenda.

3. Those who believed that the Assembly was competent to consider the matter based their case on Articles 55 and 56, under which members pledged themselves to cooperate for the achievement of universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms without distinction as to race. They also cited Article 13 which says in part that the General Assembly shall initiate studies for the purpose of assisting in the realization of human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race.

4. Without taking a dogmatic position either way on the question of competence, the Canadian Delegation drew a distinction between the General Assembly's right to discuss the question and its right to intervene. Although we had abstained on the vote to inscribe the issue on the Assembly's agenda because of our doubts as to competence, we said that we did not think that, having put the item on the agenda, the Assembly could then decide that it was incompetent to discuss it.

5. The South African Delegation made no attempts to discuss the substance of the case, even in reply to the criticisms of their policies by a large number of delegations, including the 18 who had sponsored a resolution establishing a commission to study the racial situation in South Africa and to report its conclusions to the next session of the Assembly. The sponsors of this resolution spoke for over 600 million people in Africa, the Middle East, Asia and Latin America. Even those who, like the Canadian Delegation, were unwilling to support the resolution, expressed their concern and their fear that policies of racial discrimination, wherever applied, were potentially dangerous, and in the long run were not effective. Sponsors of the resolution went much further. One even appealed to the General Assembly to forestall a situation on the African Continent which he believed could lead to the revolt of 150 million blacks against 4 million whites, and which might touch off a world war between the whites and non-whites.

6. The Scandinavian countries submitted, as an alternative to the 18-power resolution, a resolution with the same preamble but with a much milder operative part which did not single out South Africa but solemnly called upon all members to bring their policies into conformity with their obligations under the Charter to promote the observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

7. The Canadian Delegation adopted a middle course, abstaining on the inscription of the item on the agenda, voting against the South African resolution on competence, abstaining on the 18-power resolution and voting in favour of the Scandinavian resolution. On these votes the United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand were slightly more on the South African side, while the United States was somewhat less.

8. The result of the principal votes which took place on November 20 was as follows:

(a) On the South African competence resolution: 6 in favour, 45 against (including Canada) and 8 abstentions;

(b) On the 18-power resolution: 35 in favour, 2 against and 22 abstentions;

(c) On the Scandinavian resolution: 20 in favour (including Canada), 7 against and 32 abstentions.

9. Considering the strong feelings of a great many people on the subject of racial discrimination, the debate on this subject was relatively restrained and responsible. The Indians had at first sought a condemnation of South Africa but modified their resolution to establish a Study Commission. The fact that the Study Commission will have no chance whatever of entering South Africa and that its establishment may set a precedent for intervening in other matters on which the competence of the General Assembly is doubtful caused the Canadian Delegation to abstain.

10. The colonial powers, however, and especially the United Kingdom and France, fought more strongly against the competence of the Assembly to discuss such matters as racial discrimination than they fought in favour of the South African Government's policies. For the United Kingdom and France, and to a lesser extent for Australia, it was not so much a question of whether to side with South Africa, or with India and Pakistan, on the question of racial discrimination, as it was of avoiding precedents which might lead the General Assembly of the United Nations further into the affairs of non-self-governing and dependent territories — a development which at every turn is being bitterly opposed by the administering powers. Nevertheless, an important consequence of the debate was that public opinion in India and Pakistan formed the impression that the "white" members of the Commonwealth were sticking together on a racial issue, despite the obvious fact of serious discrimination which the South African Delegation made no attempt to deny.

SOUTH WEST AFRICA

A settlement of this question is no closer now than it was last January. If anything, the situation is worse, because South Africa has not appointed a representative to confer with the Ad Hoc Committee on South West Africa, even though it was invited to do so last March.

You will recall that the more important of the two resolutions on South West Africa which were approved by the General Assembly in January, solemnly appealed to South Africa to reconsider its position and resume negotiations with the Ad Hoc Committee. The resolution urged South Africa to report on its administration of the territory and transmit petitions from the South West African people to the United Nations. It also regretted that the Union of South Africa, while prepared to negotiate on the basis of certain articles of the mandate, was unwilling to carry out its international obligations with regard to the supervisory role of the United Nations. This resolution was carried by a vote of 45 in favour (including Canada), 5 against (the Soviet bloc), with 8 abstentions (including Australia, Belgium, Guatemala, Iceland, Luxembourg, New Zealand, Turkey and the United Kingdom).

One important aspect of the debate was the Trusteeship Committee's decision to grant hearings to representatives of the Hereros and, when the South African Government prevented them from coming to Paris, to the Reverend Michael Scott who appeared on their behalf. South Africa insisted that the decision to grant these hearings was illegal. Canada abstained from voting on this issue in the Trusteeship Committee because we were undecided about the legality of the resolution. We thought too that it was impolitic for Canada, at such an early stage of the Committee's proceedings, to appear to stand firmly in the camp of the administering authorities. We also believed that the Committee was morally justified in seeking fuller information on local conditions because South Africa had shown unwillingness to submit petitions from the native peoples. Later, our Legal Division's opinion was that the Trusteeship Committee did not exceed its authority in passing this resolution to give a hearing to the Hereros.

In March, 1952, the reconstituted Ad Hoc Committee invited South Africa to appoint a representative to confer with it. South Africa informed the Committee that "its considered reply would be communicated in due course". Later, the South Africans told the Secretary of the Committee that they were studying their reply but, because of a heavy parliamentary programme, cabinet ministers had been preoccupied with other business. Up to the present time, South Africa has sent no considered reply and has appointed no one to confer with the Committee. It seems likely that it will not reply to the Committee's invitation before the General Assembly meets again.

A while ago, we learned confidentially that the United Kingdom has instructed its High Commissioner in South Africa to approach the Government there, pointing out that it was becoming difficult for South Africa's friends in the Commonwealth to support her at the United Nations, and it would be even more difficult for them to do so if some real progress were not made soon on the South West Africa question. Canada, of course, has already offended South African because we were the only white member of the Commonwealth voting for the "regretting" resolution. The United States offended South Africa too by supporting the same resolution. Before this happened, South Africa had been able to say that it had the support of "responsible and respectable" powers and was opposed only by "irresponsible and coloured" states.

The Secretary of the Ad Hoc Committee told a member of our Delegation in New York that, if the Committee had to submit a negative report, South Africa would be in for a very rough ride at the next General Assembly. A resolution much stronger than the "regretting" one might be introduced; it might "deplore" or even "condemn" South Africa's attitude. It is possible too that a resolution might be introduced, suggesting that a United Nations representative or commission be sent to South West Africa. The Reverend Michael Scott suggested this last year when he spoke to the Trusteeship Committee.

Canada has been disturbed about South Africa's intransigent attitude on this question and on the Treatment of Indians question. Unfortunately, the present South African Government has no respect either for its own constitution or for the United Nations Charter; neither does it consider the International Court's opinion on South West Africa an expression of international law. It is thought that the Canadian delegation will again vote against South Africa, unless it agrees to accept the minimal obligations which the International Court found still to exist with regard to South West Africa.

THE QUESTION OF SOUTH WEST AFRICA:
DISPOSITION IN FOURTH COMMITTEE

SEVENTH SESSION, UNITED NATIONS GENERAL ASSEMBLY

In January, 1952, the General Assembly set up an Ad Hoc Committee on South West Africa and instructed it to confer with the Government of the Union of South Africa on means of implementing the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice on the status of South West Africa. On November 21, 1952, the Committee reported to the Assembly its failure to reach agreement with the Union Government on the role which the United Nations should play in supervising the administration of the former mandated territory. While agreement was reached on a number of points, two fundamental points of divergence remain unresolved:

(1) The Committee maintains that the United Nations should exercise some form of supervision over the administration of the territory. The Union Government, however, is prepared to accept only a limited form of accountability to the International Court;

(2) The Committee considers that the Union Government should conclude a new instrument with the United Nations to replace the former mandate. South Africa, on the other hand, is unwilling to negotiate such an instrument with the United Nations and proposes that it be concluded with the remaining three Principal Allied and Associated Powers, namely the United Kingdom, France and the United States.

Before the question of South West Africa came before the Fourth Committee on December 15, our delegation in New York informed us that India had drafted a resolution for which it was seeking co-sponsors among the Arab-Asian states. This resolution would have been firmer in tone than last year's resolution No. 570 A(VI) of January 19, 1952, essentially because it substituted the word "deplores" in place of the word "regrets" used in last year's resolution.

However, this Indian resolution was never submitted. Instead, the Fourth Committee discussed the item on the basis of a resolution sponsored by Brazil, El Salvador and the United States which states that the "General Assembly decides to postpone consideration of the question of South West Africa until the 8th regular session of the General Assembly and requests the Ad Hoc Committee on South West Africa, established by General Assembly resolution 570(VI) to continue on the same basis as stated in that resolution and further requests the Committee to report to the 8th regular session of the General Assembly." This resolution was passed on December 16, 1952, by a vote of 27 in favour (including Canada and South Africa), 8 against, with 5 abstentions. Some 20 delegations were absent when the vote was taken.

I attach copies of telegrams 545 of December 15+ and 552 of December 17+ which give the substance of the resolution and the voting in the Fourth Committee. No vote has yet been taken in plenary.<sup>85</sup>

TUNISIAN AND MOROCCAN QUESTIONS AT THE 7TH SESSION OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF THE UNITED NATIONS<sup>86</sup>

The request of thirteen Middle Eastern and Asian states to have the Tunisian and Moroccan questions brought before the forthcoming session of the General Assembly raises a number of delicate issues, involving both our political relations with France and the Arab world and the apparent conflict between the strategic interests of the Western world and the aspirations towards self-government of two Arab peoples in which most of the non-white world is showing an active concern. The strong measures adopted by the French to restore law and order in Tunisia in the early part of this year, combined with the failure, in April, of the Arab-Asian bloc to have the Tunisian problem inscribed on the agenda of the Security Council, and the rejection of their request for a special session of the General Assembly in June and July have undoubtedly served to fan anti-French and anti-Western sentiment in the Middle East and Asia, which the U.S.S.R. will try to exploit. On the other hand, feeling in France as a whole and particularly in the French National Assembly is also running high on this question. An attempt by the United Nations to intervene or even criticism considered unwarranted on the part of France's allies might well have serious implications either for Europe (if the French Assembly should thereby be led to refuse to ratify the E.D.C.) or for South-East Asia (if National Assembly pressure should lead the French Government to withdraw from Indochina to protect its more important North African interests). Domestic political pressures in France might also lead to a French walk-out from one of the committees of the United Nations, or even a withdrawal from the General Assembly when the North African issues are being discussed. In addition, there are involved the complex questions of the length to which the United Nations can or should go in dealing with problems which may be argued to lie within the field of domestic jurisdiction, and of the long-run effect on orderly progress in non-self-governing territories of discussion of their political affairs by United Nations bodies.

2. A balancing of the foregoing considerations suggests that Canadian policy should endeavour to go some way to satisfy the Arab and Asian nations that their interest in the struggle of colonial peoples is not being ignored while at the same time preventing any action which might produce a crisis in France or seriously prejudice the possibility of continued and constructive negotiations in Tunisia and Morocco. More specifically it is suggested in the attached instructions† for the guidance of our delegation on the subject of Tunisia that the Canadian Representative should vote in favour of including this item on the Assembly's agenda, unless special circumstances would appear to require an abstention (paras. 7 and 8). While striving to avoid a hypothetical vote on the question of competence, it is proposed in general that the delegation either abstain or vote in favour of competence, (depending largely on tactical considerations), should this issue be raised in respect of specific resolutions (paras. 11-13). As to the Canadian attitude on the substantive issue, it is suggested that we might support a mild type of resolution which would note the progress which Tunisia has made under French protection and express the hope that further constitutional reforms will be worked out by peaceful co-operation between the two parties (paras. 18-21).

3. In view of the similarities of the issues involved in Tunisia and Morocco, it is proposed that our delegation adopt a similar and consistent attitude in handling the Moroccan question.

4. It is recommended that Cabinet approve the attached instructions for the Canadian Delegation as regards Tunisia and approve a similar and consistent attitude in the handling of the Moroccan question.

TUNISIA AND MOROCCO AT THE U.N. GENERAL ASSEMBLY

(a) Tunisia

The Political Committee of the General Assembly concluded its debate on the Tunisian question on December 12 with the adoption of the Brazilian resolution by 45 to 3 (Belgium, Luxembourg and South Africa), with 10 abstentions (including the United Kingdom and the Soviet bloc). The Brazilian resolution expressed confidence that France would develop the free institutions of the Tunisian people, expressed the hope that the parties would continue negotiations on an urgent basis with a view to bringing about self-government for Tunisians, and appealed for restraint in the conduct of Franco-Tunisian relations. Canada was among the 31 states which voted to reject an Indian amendment to delete the paragraph expressing confidence in France.

2. The adoption of the Brazilian resolution was preceded by the defeat of the Arab-Asian resolution by 24 in favour, 27 against (including Canada) and 7 abstentions. This resolution maintained that the situation in Tunisia endangered international peace and security, and called for the creation of a 3-member Good Offices Committee, as well as for the inclusion of Tunisia on the agenda of the next Assembly.

3. The French did not participate in the debate, while the colonial powers, as was expected, all advanced arguments denying the competence of the U.N. The Arab-Asian nations expressed their views, for the most part, with reasonable moderation. Mr. Martin's speech stressed the fact that Canada accepted the Assembly's competence to discuss a question once it had been included on the agenda, but that the line between discussion and intervention was often hard to draw. He said that the Brazilian resolution, as it did not attempt to accuse or to condemn, provided the type of conciliatory approach with which the problem of Tunisia should be treated.

4. The Brazilian resolution was approved in plenary by 44 to 3 with 8 abstentions, after a threat by the United States to oppose the whole resolution had dissuaded the Arab Asians from making another attempt to delete the clause expressing confidence in France. Another point worth noting about the debate was the defeat of a Pakistan motion to hear a representative of the Bey, by 24 in favour to 26 against (including Canada, the other NATO countries, and about half of the Latin American countries).

5. A joint letter to Mr. Pearson has been received from the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada and the Canadian Congress of Labour, couched in moderate terms and asking us to give our support to the creation of a Good Offices Committee for Tunisia. Our reply expressed doubt as to whether such a body would justify the hopes placed in it, and stressed our belief in the necessity of direct negotiations between the two parties.

(b) Morocco

6. The Political Committee's debate on Morocco ended on December 17 with the passing of a Brazilian resolution practically identical with that on Tunisia; the vote was 40 in favour (including Canada), 5 against (including the United States), and 11 abstentions (including the United Kingdom and the Soviet bloc).

7. As originally introduced, the Brazilian resolution differed chiefly from the equivalent resolution on Tunisia in that "negotiations . . . with a view to bringing about self-government for Tunisians" was replaced by "negotiations . . . towards developing the free political institutions of the people of Morocco." Pakistan introduced an amendment to restore the stronger phraseology used in the Tunisian resolution, but the United States expressed opposition to the amendment on the grounds that the Moroccan situation differed materially from that in Tunisia. Our delegation felt that these United States tactics were not altogether happy, as the Pakistani amendment was not unreasonable and the Arab-Asian bloc had not been intransigent. Accordingly, Canada abstained in the vote on the Pakistan amendment, which was carried by 28 (Arab-Asians, Soviet bloc and some Latin-American states) to 23 (the 11 Latin-American sponsors of the resolution, the colonial powers, and the United States) with 4 abstentions (Canada, Denmark, Norway, and Turkey). It was the passing of this amendment which led the United States to vote against the Brazilian resolution as a whole.

8. The Arab-Asians had previously submitted their own resolution on Morocco. This resolution was a somewhat vague document which pointed to the recent judgement of the International Court recognizing "the sovereignty and independence of His Majesty the Sultan;" stated that the Moroccan situation "adversely affects . . . peaceful conditions in the world;" and urged Franco-Moroccan negotiations to reach "an early peaceful settlement in accord with the sovereignty of Morocco, the aspirations of her people and the Charter of the United Nations." It was not made clear what these aspirations were. The operative paragraphs of the resolution were rejected in a series of votes of about 20 in favour, 25 against (including Canada), and 10 abstentions and no vote was taken on the resolution as a whole.

9. The debate on Morocco was shorter than that on Tunisia and little of significance was said. It is worth noting that the Arab-Asians originally wished to co-sponsor the Brazilian resolution, although Brazil did not respond to their overture for political reasons. The Arab-Asians' own resolution was put forward later.

10. I attach copies of some of the relevant telegrams,† and also of the correspondence with the two labour organizations.†

SEVENTH SESSION GENERAL ASSEMBLY — CHRISTMAS REPORT

The Assembly adjourned at 4:45 a.m. on Monday, December 22, to reconvene on February 24 or earlier at the call of the President. Ten items remain on the Assembly's agenda for February, to be dealt with in the First Committee or in Plenary. The other Committees will not be reconstituted. I should think that we therefore have at least another six weeks' work ahead of us, and probably more if the new United States Administration decides to press for further measures in Korea.

2. As Mr. Pearson, Mr. Martin and the Ottawa members of the Assembly Delegation returned home before there was time to prepare an assessment of the work of the Assembly, the best I can do is to send you our tentative report and leave it to those who have returned to Ottawa to supplement or correct our impressions.

Was the Assembly Worthwhile?

3. There is no doubt that many members of delegations with whom we have close ties are returning home not only weary but wondering whether anything has been achieved at this session to compensate for the intense efforts devoted to interminable debates and for the serious disturbances in North and South Africa and other dependent areas which coincided with the Assembly's discussion of their problems. This view is not confined to the United Kingdom, French and South African Delegations. For example Walter Lippmann said a few days ago that "things have gone so badly during this session that there are many, once ardent supporters, who are asking whether the Organization can survive. There are even some who are asking whether it ought to survive."

4. I do not think any member of the Canadian Delegation would judge this Assembly so harshly. In fact I would have said that this has been one of the most important, interesting, and relatively productive Assemblies. In so far as the work of the Canadian Delegation was concerned, this Assembly has been one of the toughest. Not only did this Assembly, unlike its predecessor, have the big political problems before it, but the election of the head of our Delegation to the Presidency and the very active role which the President personally played, added considerably to the significance and effectiveness of our work. This was most clearly shown in the Korean discussions, particularly those behind the scenes. There were exceptions, but all in all, both the Korean and the colonial questions, including North and South Africa, were discussed more responsibly and with less propaganda than anyone could have expected before the Assembly met. At the same time, even some non-colonial delegations could not help wondering whether, by admitting such issues as Tunisia and Morocco to the Assembly's agenda, we have not opened a Pandora's box which will plague not only the French but other Western delegations in years to come. These doubts are genuine but the question is probably academic. For Tunisia and Morocco could hardly have been kept off the Assembly's agenda this year. In these circumstances the Assembly's moderation this year was a sign that it may rise to its responsibilities, surviving, on the one hand, the excesses of some of the smaller powers, and on the other the negative attitude of some of the larger powers.

Pre-Assembly Talks

5. For the first time in several years, there were no formal pre-Assembly talks held between the United Kingdom, United States, French and Canadian Delegations. The State Department sent officials to New York, Paris and London for bilateral talks, while French and United Kingdom officials held separate discussions with the Americans in Washington. The United Kingdom Government made a special effort to make its point of view on colonial questions thoroughly understood, sending senior officials for pre-Assembly talks in Ottawa and Washington. Canadian preparations were, therefore, largely based on bilateral talks in Washington and New York and, to a lesser extent, in London and Paris. So far as we can tell, this pattern is likely to continue in future years unless one of the Big Three has some major theme to present to the Assembly.

Themes

6. At the two previous Assemblies the United States Government decided to develop themes on which it was prepared to take the offensive. In 1950, the Uniting for Peace resolution was the theme; last year it was the tripartite disarmament proposal. This year, by contrast, no theme has been developed, although the United Kingdom Government intend to concentrate on the Soviet "Hate Campaign" when the bacteriological warfare item is discussed after we reconvene in February.

Korea

7. The Korean debate was, by all odds, the most important as well as the most lengthy. Within the scope of this summary I shall not attempt any general appreciation, the more so in view of the role played in the negotiations by the President of the Assembly and Mr. Martin. They together with Mr. Selwyn Lloyd of the United Kingdom Delegation gave the Indian Representative, Mr. Krishna Menon, every encouragement in his effort to draft a resolution on the one outstanding issue of prisoners-of-war which would provide an acceptable basis for an armistice in the opinion of the entire free world. In the protracted private negotiations which preceded the formal action of the Indian Delegation, the steady and conciliatory role which the leaders of the Canadian and United Kingdom delegations played between the Indian and United States delegations was of great importance, although Soviet rejection of the resolution a week before the vote, combined with the amendments accepted by India, made it easier for the United States Government to accept the resolution in the end.

8. At first, the United States had opposed the Indian resolution and had seemed strangely blind to the advantages of having India take the lead in a matter of this kind. Wishing the vindication of an Assembly resolution endorsing all negotiations and actions of the Unified Command, the United States failed to realize the greater value to be gained from focussing the debate solely on the prisoner-of-war issue and on the principle of non-forcible repatriation which the Arab-Asian group were willing to accept. Had they persisted in bringing their original 21-power resolution to a vote, the Arab-Asian group would not have voted for the general endorsement the United States Government wanted. Indeed, the terms of this resolution had already been rejected by the Communist Command at Panmunjom.

9. The Assembly was bound to try something at least a little different. The Indian plan seemed to offer a method for getting prisoners of war on the move and eventually reducing the problem in size, even if it did not necessarily provide a complete solution for the problem presented by those prisoners of war who would continue to resist repatriation.

10. When the Indian plan was first put forward, a large number of delegations believed there were grounds for hoping that it might prove acceptable to the Chinese and North Korean authorities. The United States Delegation never shared this hope. When the plan was so bitterly attacked by the Soviet Union, hopes diminished almost to the vanishing point. However, a number of responsible delegations, including those of the United Kingdom, Canada and France, found it difficult to believe that the Indian Government would have taken the initiative if it had not had some indication from its contacts in Peking that a scheme along the lines of that which was put forward might be acceptable to the Chinese Communists. It may be that the revisions which it was necessary to make in the original Indian resolution in order to gain the support of the United States doomed the final resolution in the eyes of the other side. No one could argue that these revisions were not in the interest of clarity, especially with respect to the principle of non-forcible repatriation, but it may be that any compromise scheme which will lead to solution of the prisoner of war problem may have to be kept deliberately vague.

11. In the event, the proposal did not lead to an armistice. But the sincerity of the attempt left no one at the Assembly in any doubt whatever as to where the responsibility for the continuation of the fighting lay. The Chinese were offered a formula which could have saved their face if they had wanted an honourable settlement. The early rejection of the Soviet Government may possibly have been prompted by their fear that the Chinese were considering the offer too seriously. At any rate, the Indian resolution which united the free world against the Soviet bloc on December 3 — 54 votes to 5 with only China abstaining — was the major achievement of this session, and Canada had a large part in it. Had it succeeded, we would have had peace. It was an attempt that had to be made. Even in failure, it was an impressive propaganda success. The Assembly has seen no greater demonstration of the solidarity of the free world.

12. That the Soviet Government itself recognized their defeat and smarted under it is, I think, sufficiently proved by their last minute propaganda manoeuvre of introducing a resolution accusing the United States of the "mass murder" of Korean prisoners of war at Pongam. Though they did not manage to gain a single favourable vote for their resolution from outside their own bloc, they did manage to obtain ten Arab-Asian abstentions including India and Pakistan. This vote no doubt will take some of the sting out of the defeat suffered by the Soviet bloc on the vote on the Indian resolution.

13. It is difficult not to express disappointment that India and Pakistan saw fit to abstain on the Soviet resolution, no doubt because they felt that they did not have all the facts in the case and might have suspected the United States of using more force than was strictly necessary. On the other hand, the Soviet resolution using terms such as "mass murder" was expressed in such extreme language as to demand a negative vote by fair minded delegations. Jamali of Iraq recognized this and voted against the resolution. Pakistan at that time represented by a junior official apparently followed the lead of India. The decision was Menon's, taken we understand, against the advice of Madame Pandit, the leader of his delegation. Perhaps, having gone rather further towards the Western position than he had intended in his Korean resolution, Menon was trying to reassert India's neutrality. Gromyko had called him a "rubber stamp of American policy in Korea", and western spokesmen had perhaps crowed too loudly about "lining up" India on the western side of the fence. Menon, apparently, was determined to get back on the fence.

14. The Chinese rejected the President's appeal and the Assembly's resolution on December 14 and the North Koreans followed suit a week later. Both used terms which Soviet spokesmen had already made familiar. Both called the Assembly's resolution "illegal" and insisted that the Soviet resolution had provided the only path to peace. In other words, they wanted to call a halt in the fighting before, rather than after, explicit agreement had been reached on the repatriation of prisoners of war, leaving it to a Commission of five to carry through the repatriation of all prisoners in accordance with the Communist interpretation of the Geneva Convention, even if this meant repatriation of prisoners by force.

15. When the Assembly reconvenes, we shall presumably know what plans the new United States Administration has for resuming negotiations or stepping up the fighting. One of the most important by-products of the Indian resolution was that it made it possible to avoid any "second stage" proposals which the "lame duck" United States Delegation might otherwise have submitted in an effort to get more help from its Allies. The Soviet and Chinese Governments will also, one must suppose, be more interested in what the new Eisenhower Administration has to say than in an Asian "neutral's" proposals carrying the reluctant consent of a dying Administration.

Tunisia, Morocco, South Africa and the Competence Issue

16. In contrast to the Korean discussions in which Canada, the United Kingdom and India had worked very closely together our Delegation found that when we came to the colonial questions we were almost invariably divided from the other "old" Commonwealth members and from many NATO countries, notably France. Canada tended, on colonial issues, to side with the United States and was even, as for example in the case of Morocco, occasionally "ahead" of the United States. The example of Morocco just given, in which Canada voted in Committee for a mild resolution which the United States opposed, may be attributable to the more direct responsibility of the United States for such questions as the French Government's ratification of the European Defence Community Treaty on which Canada's vote could have little, if any, effect, and perhaps also to United States defence interests in Morocco.

17. The "liberal" stand taken by the Canadian and United States Delegations on most of these questions was not only, I think, justified on legal grounds but also for general political reasons such as our desire to "bridge the gap" with the more moderate Arab-Asian and Latin delegations. It was also a fair reflection of the currents of public opinion on these questions in both Canada and the United States. By contrast, the United Kingdom, South African and French Governments had necessarily to bear in mind their own colonial responsibilities and the repercussions, even of Assembly discussion, on the territories and peoples for which they are responsible.

18. Although colonial questions as such came before the Fourth Committee, I should like first to discuss the politically more important questions relating to North Africa (Tunisia and Morocco) and South Africa which came before the two Political Committees. They were fundamentally the expression of Arab and Asian nationalism, trying, through the United Nations, to promote the independence of Arabs in North Africa and the rights of coloured men in South Africa. The Assembly was in effect being asked to consider whether two European minorities of under two million people each should be allowed to continue to direct the affairs of very large Arab and African populations by means of various kinds of discrimination contrary to the Charter of the United Nations.

19. The debates on Tunisia, Morocco and South Africa were largely concerned with the question of competence. Had the Assembly the right to discuss, consider or make recommendations about these problems? France and South Africa took an extreme position and denied the right of the Assembly even to discuss these questions. After making its position clear in the general debate in Plenary France absented itself while Tunisia and Morocco were under discussion in the Political Committee. Though holding the same legal view South Africa adopted different tactics. Unlike France, South Africa argued its legal case ably and forcibly when South African questions were under discussion in Plenary and in the Ad Hoc Committee, but would not discuss the merits of its case. The legal view taken by France and South Africa on the competence issue had the full support of the United Kingdom, Australia, Belgium and a number of the other colonial powers, although most of these countries regretted France's decision to absent itself from the Committee.

20. The Canadian Delegation, along with a number of other delegations including the U.S. Delegation and the Scandinavian delegations, made it clear that they considered that the General Assembly had authority to discuss these questions and even to make recommendations about them. These delegations also made it equally clear that they would closely examine any recommendation emerging from the discussions to make sure that it did not in their view constitute intervention in the internal affairs of the countries concerned.

21. Acting on these principles the Canadian Delegation voted in favour of moderate General Assembly resolutions on Tunisia and Morocco which had been put forward by Brazil and a group of Latin-American delegations encouraged by the United States. We voted against stronger resolutions sponsored by a group of Arab-Asian countries. The moderate resolutions on Tunisia and Morocco, were eventually approved by the necessary two-thirds in Plenary Session. The resolutions of the Arab-Asian group were defeated. Hence in spite of the uncompromising stand taken by France the resolutions eventually passed by the General Assembly on Tunisia and Morocco were such as not even France could take very strong objection to.

22. As regards the South African racial discrimination item, the Canadian Delegation voted in favour of a moderate resolution sponsored by the Scandinavian powers, recalling the objectives of the United Nations and the obligations of all members in regard to human rights without singling out South Africa. We abstained on the resolution setting up a Commission to study racial discrimination in South Africa. Our abstention on this latter resolution in Plenary was keenly resented by South Africa, because a number of delegations including the Scandinavian countries (but not including Canada or the United States) changed their votes from an abstention in Committee to a vote against in Plenary. On the item dealing with Indians in South Africa the Canadian Delegation abstained on the resolution setting up a Good Offices Commission to assist in bringing about negotiations between the governments concerned.

23. As a result of the moderate attitude taken by a number of delegations including the Scandinavian group, most of the Latin-American group, the United States and Canada, the debates on Tunisia, Morocco and South Africa, which had been feared by many delegations including Canada passed off much better than had been expected.

Trusteeship and Colonial Questions

24. In the Fourth Committee, despite many criticisms of the slowness of the administering powers in preparing their dependent territories for self-government and some assertions that colonialism is an evil which must be wiped out, there has been greater readiness than we had expected on the part of the more responsible Arab and Asian and Latin Delegations to recognize that the administering powers have a positive and necessary role to play.

25. Up to a point, the extremists set the pace by presenting resolutions, usually of a challenging nature, on most of the main items. Very few such resolutions, however, were adopted unchanged if their original form was really extreme. In order to rally adequate support, it was necessary at least to give the impression that an attempt was being made to keep the proposals moderate and reasonable and to avoid gratuitous offence to the administering powers. This was an indication that the bulk of the Committee wanted to act in a responsible fashion and to work with the colonial powers.

26. Against this is the fact that even in this modified form the resolutions which were able to rally a majority were still in many cases unacceptable not only to the administering powers but to other western states and were occasionally rash and irresponsible in many of their provisions. Some examples are the resolution on factors determining self-government with its dogmatic declaratory clauses, the resolution calling on the Tanganyika Government to return the land taken from the Wa-Meru tribe and the resolution on the Togolands requesting France and the United Kingdom to consider revising their trusteeship agreements. A more co-operative attitude was, however, shown in Plenary where the resolution on the Wa-Meru tribe failed to obtain the necessary two-thirds majority and the resolution on the Togolands problem was so amended as to make it acceptable to the administering powers.

27. The administering powers for their part have not been too skillful in handling the situation. Admittedly it is a difficult one to deal with when there is a real degree of unreasonableness and lack of restraint on the other side; and the habit of resistance to unwarranted demands and unfounded criticisms, coupled with the feeling of being in a small minority chronically exposed to irresponsible attacks, has produced a defensive psychology that results in a somewhat negative attitude. If the administering powers were prepared to assert a more positive policy of trying to work with the United Nations, coupled with an exploitation of their past achievements and their present progressive policies, and were ready to try out some of the resolutions which though undesirable are not actually inapplicable, they might gradually win a response from countries which at the moment are not actually hostile but are not convinced that the colonial powers are really interested in promoting self-government, especially of the colonial as distinct from the trust territories. The more forthcoming approach that Hopkinson adopted for the United Kingdom at the beginning of the session made a better impression than Sir Alan Burns' less conciliatory tone.

28. Although the United Kingdom representatives probably feel that their country has been under constant sniping, it was in fact far less of a target than either Belgium or France. Belgian administration in the Congo came in for a good deal of criticism, and their representative Mr. Ryckmans — an experienced and very able man — more or less established himself as the prototype of the old colonial outlook, however paternal and benevolent that outlook may have been. The French in addition to direct attacks had to suffer from adverse comparisons between their trust territories and the adjacent British ones; and M. Pignon did not handle things well.

29. By the latter part of the session a middle group of moderates had begun to emerge among the smaller powers. This included Israel, Thailand, Colombia, the Dominican Republic, the Scandinavian countries and New Zealand. The Netherlands and of course the United States also could usually be counted among the moderates during the debates on the Trusteeship system. It was a very shifting group without real cohesion, but it gave Canada a number of friends with whom we could normally act in common. If these states should become more consistent in their opposition to extreme or impractical proposals, they might have a moderating effect on still other states with which they are associated.

30. In the early days of the Committee, Canada several times voted against our normal associates in NATO and the Old Commonwealth. Their sense of shock and resentment at this apparent desertion was much greater than was warranted by the importance of the issues involved, and was expressed in a discontinuance of invitations to attend the meetings of the administering powers. In the later part of the session we found ourselves voting much more habitually with our accustomed friends. By that time, however, we had fairly well established our independence of mind; and the value of this achievement was attested when on several occasions the United Kingdom and the United States appealed to us to intervene in debate on matters on which we would normally have remained silent. Altogether, the Canadian Delegation took much less of a back seat in the Fourth Committee's work this year than in previous years.

31. One of the things that bedevilled the Committee was the question of oral hearings. Nearly one-third of the whole session was consumed in discussing applications and holding hearings and debating resolutions that should have been dealt with by the Trusteeship Council, not the Assembly. Since a number of the hearings took place in the dying days of the Session when there was neither time to give full consideration nor available material on which to base a reasoned judgement, the value of such hearings to the operation of the trusteeship, or the benefit to the groups involved, will be slender at best.

Palestine

32. In the context of the Assembly's work as a whole the discussion of Palestine seemed once again something apart — a bitter struggle between Arabs upholding previous Assembly resolutions they had disregarded and Israelis refusing to be bound by the very resolutions to which they owe their existence as a State.

33. Israel's efforts to free herself from previous United Nations resolutions concerning refugees, the internationalization of Jerusalem and the territorial division of Palestine were partially successful, but not in the sense expected. Israel had hoped this would be brought about through a resolution calling on the parties to the Palestine dispute to settle their differences by direct negotiation. The resolution in question so aroused the antagonism of the Arab States, because it did not reaffirm past Assembly resolutions on the three points just mentioned, that direct negotiations seemed quite unlikely to take place on the basis of the draft resolution of which Canada was one of eight co-sponsors. However, the resolution was defeated in Plenary, where it failed to gain a two-thirds' majority following a surprise Soviet switch from abstention to a negative vote and the unsettling of some Latin votes over the question of Jerusalem. This so elated the Arabs that there is a possibility that they may agree to negotiate. Moreover their realization that the Assembly is not likely to reaffirm its past resolutions on Palestine may make them hesitate to inscribe the Palestine question on the agenda of the Eighth Session of the Assembly.

34. The fact that the vote was a draw this year has made both parties feel they are off to a fresh start, and for this reason if for no other, the debate has been useful. It has had, however, an unfortunate effect on British relations with the Arabs which may affect adversely the planning for Middle East defence owing to the violent reaction in the Middle East to Lord Llewellyn's unvarnished statement that the refugees would be happier if they settled in Arab States than if they returned to their former homes in Israel.

35. The efforts of the Canadian Delegation were directed towards securing a more moderate draft resolution than had been privately proposed by the Israeli Delegation. Although at first resentful of these efforts, the Delegation of Israel later came to support the results of our work. They also responded in the end to our suggestion that the expression of a co-operative attitude on their part might provide a useful background for the negotiations. We also persuaded the Arabs to reduce their claims from implementation of all 54 past resolutions of the United Nations to the implementation of the Assembly's resolution of November 29, 1947 and a single paragraph of the resolution of December 11, 1948. These accomplishments were, however, offset by the failure of our resolution to achieve what we had hoped. Once again, the Delegation felt the lack of direct Canadian diplomatic representation in the Middle East.

Economic Questions

36. Members of the Delegation attending the Political Committees had the satisfaction of knowing that they were considering even if not settling important political issues. Members attending the Second or Economic Committee did not have the same satisfaction. It was generally realized that the important decisions in the economic field were taken elsewhere. Moreover the burning issue of the establishment of an International Development Fund to make capital grants, which caused lively debates last year, was not on the agenda this year because the Economic and Social Council instead of producing its expected report had set up a group of experts to make further studies. Hence debates in the Second Committee tended to be theoretical and to deal with secondary questions.

37. In only one field did its debates have special significance: in the restless pleadings of the under-developed primary producers for sufficient capital to industrialize their countries in some small measure. Yet these were the countries which insisted on passing the nationalization resolution which, despite disclaimers, was most likely to succeed, not in attracting, but in frightening away any private, or even public capital available for the purpose. The resolution was one-sided and failed to acknowledge the obligation to pay compensation for nationalized wealth and resources.

38. Of all the resolutions considered by the Committee only one reached it on the initiative of the group of countries of mature economies. This was the resolution which endorsed the Economic and Social Council's recommendation that the goal of the Technical Assistance Programme for 1953 should be $25,000,000. Some of the remaining resolutions were submitted by the Arab-Asian countries, but the majority emanated from the Latin-American group. The initiative in Committee 2 has thus passed almost entirely to the under-developed group, with the Latin Americans in the lead and the Arab-Asian-African delegations giving fairly consistent support. As a result, the industrialized states were fighting a sterile defensive action throughout the session and devoted almost all their efforts to the removal of the most objectionable features from resolutions which were at their worst irresponsible and at their best a mere reaffirmation of previously defined objectives.

39. This situation was partly due to the lack of leadership from the United Kingdom delegation and to the species of paralysis which domestic political circumstances imposed upon the Americans. But a more serious and more fundamental cause was the fact that the industrialized countries as a group had no positive approach to what is after all bound to be in the foreseeable future a main preoccupation of the Economic and Social Council and the principal work of the Second Committee of the Assembly.

40. In the past a constructive step towards meeting the aspirations of the under-developed countries through international rather than purely bilateral action was the establishment of the various Specialized Agencies, including the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development. The most recent has been the Technical Assistance Program (complemented by the American Point Four Programme and the Colombo Plan). Very valuable work can be and has been done under these technical assistance programmes. But we now seem to have reached the stage where the programme is losing its momentum, or at least where some new initiative is needed if United Nations action in this field is to be fruitful.

41. In recent years, the tendency in the United States has been more towards bilateral action. This tendency may be increased with the advent of a Republican administration. We ourselves will certainly always retain an area of bilateral action or action through the Commonwealth grouping. There is nevertheless a field in which economic considerations are strongly affected by political and social factors which is proper to the United Nations in the international sphere, just as it may be proper to the public corporation in the national sphere. The much discussed International Development Fund, for example, might possibly, with careful organization and proper safeguards, be the most economical and politically effective way to meet certain of the financial needs of under-developed countries. If our expanding productive plans require expanding markets, and if technical assistance is really not enough, from the point of view of the developed countries themselves, as even Mr. van Zeeland<sup>87</sup> was prepared to admit, the big question is whether capital assistance should come on a bilateral or on an international basis.

Human Rights and Wrongs

42. The Third Committee, like the Second, spent most of its time on questions of secondary political importance, at least to Canada. The same groupings were apparent as in the Third and Fourth Committees, and not infrequently the same sense of unreality.

43. The most important intervention by Canada was made in the closing days of the session by Mr. Martin who drew the Committee's attention, in a vigorous statement, to religious persecution in Eastern Europe as instanced most recently by the four death sentences passed in Bulgaria but not yet carried out. Mr. Martin's statement was one of the few direct and telling attacks made during the Assembly against the principal violators of human rights and fundamental freedoms who so glibly accuse others of crimes which they have perfected.

Paul van Zeeland, Minister for Foreign Affairs of Belgium; Chairman of Delegation to the Seventh Session of the General Assembly.

44. The three resolutions of the Third Committee which attracted the most attention were those dealing with:

- (a) Freedom of Information
- (b) Political Rights of Women
- (c) Self-Determination of Peoples

The Canadian Delegation opposed the Assembly's resolution dealing with the Convention on the International Right of Correction. Along with the United States Delegation and others, we felt that the Convention would contribute not to the freedom of the press but to government-imposed restrictions requiring the press to publish not merely corrections but official propaganda.

45. We supported the opening for signature of a Convention on the Political Rights of Women after a colonial application clause had been deleted so that it was no longer slanted against the colonial powers.

46. The resolutions dealing with self-determination of peoples, however, even in their amended form, were still somewhat discriminatory in that they were directed against the administering powers and might be construed as an attempt to amend the Charter by back-door methods. The Canadian Delegation therefore abstained.

Legal questions

47. The two principal items which came before the Sixth Committee were:

- (a) the question of defining aggression; and
- (b) the question of setting up an International Criminal Court.

The Canadian attitude towards both these questions was that, while we were not opposed in principle, consideration of concrete proposals now was premature in the world in which we live and in the relatively embryonic state of international law. The United States and United Kingdom Delegations were more vigorous in their opposition than the Canadian, and voted against the final compromise resolutions while we abstained. These resolutions, in effect, served to postpone further consideration of these items for two years, but the Arabs, Asians and Latins, with Soviet support, managed to make sure that these questions will be included on the Assembly's agenda for 1954, and will be given further study in Committee in the meantime.

48. Mr. Vishinsky honoured the Sixth Committee with a personal performance during the debate on the definition of aggression but he was too stereotyped to be really effective. He argued that the refusal of the NATO powers to consider a definition of aggression "exposed their aggressive intentions" against the Soviet Union and that their talk about loopholes in any possible definition was only to cover up their evil designs.

Secretariat Troubles

49. The suicide of A.H. Feller, Mr. Lie's General Counsel and top legal adviser, dramatized the state of demoralization into which the Secretariat as a whole has been sinking in recent months, under the impact of exaggerated charges in the United States press of "Reds in the U.N.". Much quiet work was done during the Assembly by a number of delegations, including the Canadian, to allay fears that we were willing to stand by and allow United States hysteria to force the Secretary-General to expel from the Secretariat any American citizen considered undesirable by the host country.

50. Unfortunately, Mr. Lie accepted the Jurists' Advisory Report with undue and unnecessary alacrity as the basis of his personnel policies. Although his action calmed Senator Wiley, it alarmed other delegations concerned to maintain the international character of the Secretariat. However, the combined pleas of the President, the Chairman of the Fifth Committee and a number of delegations including the Canadian Delegation served to forestall a debate before Christmas which would have been unprofitable in the present atmosphere. At the Secretary-General's request, an item has been included in the Assembly's agenda which will ensure a full discussion of this issue in February or March.

Management

51. This Assembly was as difficult to control as its predecessors. Although the Sixth Committee studied some sensible but rather minor proposals of the Secretary-General's for improving the Rules of Procedure and shortening sessions of the General Assembly, only one was approved, the others being referred to a Committee for study and report next year. From the debates it appeared that no tampering with the sacred right to speak would be permitted by the majority of the Members. Experience has shown that the Chairmen who are most successful in completing their Committee's agenda under pressure (e.g. Kyrö of the Ad Hoc Committee), are those least inclined to give rulings.

52. Nevertheless, if Foreign Ministers are to attend a fair proportion of the time an Assembly is in session, something must obviously be done to accomplish the Assembly's task in less time than it takes at present.

Spring Sessions

53. This Assembly suffered more than any previous session from the lack of leadership from the United States Delegation. The disruption which United States elections cause to the work of Assemblies every other year has led some Delegations, including our own, to wonder whether it would not be better to aim at holding Assemblies in the Spring rather than the Fall, despite the administrative difficulties and in some cases (e.g. the United Kingdom) the parliamentary inconvenience involved. The proposal is to be explored fully at the next session of the Assembly.

Power Groupings

54. The Soviet Bloc — The Soviet Delegation was an unusually strong one. When the Assembly met, it was generally expected that the Soviet Delegation would take some new initiative or in other ways reflect the policies announced at the 19th Party Congress which concluded in Moscow as the Assembly convened. In the event, the Soviet Delegation took no new tacks, sang the old songs with less zest to a case-hardened audience, and reflected neither the note of confidence nor the shifts in the Party line which emerged from the Congress. With the exception of a brief and only partially successful foray (the "mass murder" of Korean prisoners of war) as the Assembly was adjourning for Christmas, the Soviets seemed largely on the defensive — perhaps bored or tired, perhaps saving their fire until other items more suited to their cold warfare come up after Christmas. Although we can know little about the relations between Moscow and Peking, the main achievement of Soviet policy during the Assembly may have been in keeping China in the Korean war by engineering their rejection of the Assembly's resolution.

55. NATO — The NATO Powers were deeply divided on colonial questions, especially Tunisia and Morocco, and on the competence issue in a manner which could only bring comfort to the Soviet bloc. Yet, as the United States vote against the Moroccan resolution showed, concern for any weakening of NATO obviously influences positions taken in the United Nations by NATO powers. If the choice is between a free North Africa without NATO airfields and a French North Africa with them there was little doubt where our immediate interests lay.

56. As for our more long term interests, there was room for doubt, and the doubts were reflected in the divisions within NATO on these issues. For in the long run the NATO Powers must also find an answer to the untidy problems that lie outside their tidy fences. How to live with Arab and Asian nationalism is one of the most urgent of these problems. Thanks to the United Nations, we have been made aware of its existence and force before it becomes too late to do anything useful about it, before it turns sour and possibly Soviet, and while it is still possible for orderly change to take place. Already since 1945, we are reminded, 600 million people have emerged from dependent to independent status.

57. The Commonwealth — It was a fortunate development that no hard and fast lines formed between the "old" and "new" Commonwealth countries during the Assembly's discussions of North and South Africa, and of colonial questions as such. Had India and Pakistan come to feel that on all such issues the "white" Commonwealth would be ranged against the non-white, the intimate and fruitful co-operation which marked the Korean debate would hardly have been possible. At the same time, too much should not be made of Commonwealth solidarity on Korea, against the United States. Although it was an important political fact, it was conditioned in part by the desire to put off until February any consideration of United States proposals for the "next stage" in Korea.

58. Arabs, Asians and Latins — This grouping, never solid but capable of delivering 34 votes of the Assembly's 60, was the real question mark at this Assembly. These states have a majority and with a few additional votes can obtain a two-thirds vote and thus pass any resolution on which they can all agree. Fortunately for the rest of us, they seldom, if ever, all agreed. But the co-operation of Arabs, Asians and several Latins was sufficiently close to elect to office certain candidates whose qualifications leave something to be desired (e.g. Nosek<sup>88</sup> in place of Sharp<sup>89</sup> on the Contributions Committee). The potential voting strength worried the more "responsible" delegations constantly, not only on budgetary and economic but on political questions as well. The fear of this grouping and its potential power is now sufficiently clear to all that the Soviet line, which Gromyko repeated at this Assembly, about the United Nations being "a branch office of the State Department," is made ridiculous. It is this fear which makes France and the United Kingdom so eager to stand by the letter of the Charter, and so opposed to the slightest tampering with the veto.

Conclusion

59. The United Nations seemed on the whole to be growing up at this Assembly. It is true that there were many shortcomings. Much was done that should not have been done; much was left undone. Many issues were ignored. Austria was discussed briefly to please the Austrians, but nothing was said about Germany. East-West issues other than Korea were either left until the Assembly reconvenes or not put on the agenda. Other issues were raised only to be postponed. The contentious questions of the definition of aggression were shelved in Committee for two years and of the admission of new members for one year.

60. Hence, though in fact no issue was really settled, the main lines of effort were worthwhile. Some big issues at least in the political field have been aired without wars or walk-outs. There has been discussion with a minimum of intervention. There has been an attempt to bring peace to Korea and it did at any rate unite the free world as never before. The General Assembly provided the occasion for some contact between increasingly isolated groupings and sharpened the world's acuity in distinguishing shameless propaganda from an honest accounting.

14th Session of Economic and Social Council

2. Mr. Scott. The Canadian delegation to the 14th session of the Economic and Social Council which opens in New York on May 20th will be Mr. Jean Lesage, Parliamentary Assistant to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Alternate Representatives will be Mr. D.M. Johnson, Permanent Canadian Representative to the United Nations and Dr. F.G. Robertson, M.P., Mr. James Sinclair, Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance and Dr. G.F. Davidson, Deputy Minister of Welfare, will attend the session for short periods as Alternate Representatives. Advisers will be Mr. Summers and Mr. Warren from this Department and Mr. Pollock from the Department of Finance. Mr. Crépault of the Permanent Delegation to the U.N. in New York will be an Adviser and Secretary of the Delegation. Other Alternates and Advisers will attend the session as required from time to time. As the normal two sessions have been telescoped into one in 1952 because of the unusually long duration of the Sixth Session of the General Assembly, the forthcoming meeting of ECOSOC will be long. It is expected to last about twelve weeks. There are at present almost fifty items on the agenda. Among the economic items to be considered are the World Economic Situation, Full Employment and the Economic Development of Under-developed Countries. This last item is perhaps the most important on the Council's agenda. Under it will be considered Resolution 520 (VI) of the General Assembly which requests the Council to submit to the Assembly a detailed plan for establishing, as soon as circumstances permit, a special fund for grants-in-aid and for low-interest, long-term loans to under-developed countries. The plan is to include recommendations concerning the size, composition and administration of the special fund, the manner of collecting contributions to it and the character of such contributions. This item poses a great problem for Canada and other Western, developed countries. Arrayed against strong domestic and fiscal considerations is the necessity of maintaining and strengthening understanding and sympathy between the free countries of the world, developed and underdeveloped.<sup>90</sup> An issue such as this sets up a perplexing conflict of interests and great skill will be required from the Western delegations at the Council in order not to widen the gap between the poorer and richer free nations which was so apparent at the Sixth Session of the General Assembly. Of the social items before the Council the most important is that concerning Human Rights. The Commission on Human Rights has been asked to prepare for the Seventh Session of the General Assembly two Covenants on Human Rights, one dealing with traditional civil-political rights, the other with economic, social and cultural rights. The Council must consider the drafts of the covenants before transmitting them to the Assembly. Here, again, the free world is divided; the developed countries of Europe and North American take a different approach from that of the under-developed countries of Asia and Latin America, particularly with regard to economic and social rights. The discussions in the Human Rights Commission offer little hope that much common ground is likely to be found at the Council.

ASSESSMENT OF FIRST HALF OF 14TH SESSION OF ECOSOC

Reference: Your despatch No. 12 of June 5, 1952.<sup>91</sup>

1. As anticipated in your communication under reference, the Delegation has been bearing in mind the desirability of attempting to draw up an Assessment of the first half of the 14th Session of the Economic and Social Council. Copies of this Assessment, the general contents of which have been concurred in by all the members of the Delegation, are attached.

2. We should like to point out that the object of this Report is mainly to give an appreciation of the general atmosphere which has prevailed during the first half of the Session, and to set down the impressions which the Delegation has formed as to the broad policies being pursued by particular groups of countries, in particular the Communist bloc and the under-developed countries. As a mere half-way report, it does not attempt to draw definite conclusions.

Assessment of the First Half of the Fourteenth Session of the Economic and Social Council, New York, 1952

1. In general terms it may be said that there is a distinct change from the atmosphere which has prevailed in the two preceding sessions held in Santiago and Geneva. There has been less acrimony and fewer exchanges of bitter propaganda between the Communist bloc and other countries. The under-developed countries have not attempted to over state their case. It would be an overstatement to say that this improvement in atmosphere has given us a harmonious and efficiently working Council. Rather, there has been a tendency to avoid unduly provocative exchanges and excesses of over enthusiasm. In part, this may be attributed to a desire to avoid futile debates. It may also be due to sheer frustration and boredom. It is perhaps not unnatural that certain representatives should wish to avoid unnecessary unpleasantness. This attitude might be described as lethargy, however, we would be more inclined to treat it as a sort of armed neutrality, with basic positions unchanged.

2. If we were to describe the Russian attitude in a few words, we would say that they did not press their case too strongly, yet never compromised it.

3. On the other hand, the under-developed countries seemed to have realized that if they were to press their case for assistance too strongly it might react to their disadvantage.

ATTITUDE OF SOVIET BLOC

4. The Soviet attitude has provided one of the surprises of this Session. In general, the spokesmen of the Soviet group have been mild in their statements. This is particularly true if compared with the speeches we had become accustomed to at previous Council sessions, and with those of Mr. Malik at recent meetings of the Disarmament Commission and the Security Council. Even their stronger statements did not seem to be meant to disrupt the work of the Council and their approach was rarely provocative. Even though all three delegations continued to follow the Party Line, the old personal attacks were distinctly absent except in one or two instances. At the same time, the Soviet delegations replied vigorously whenever attacked, and energetically advanced their viewpoint whenever they considered it expedient or helpful for purposes of propaganda. They might even have been more provocative if we ourselves had been more anxious to put forth vigorously our own viewpoint.

5. It may be that Moscow has come to the conclusion that the tactics followed over the past two years have failed to draw the under-developed countries into their orbit, but on the contrary have succeeded only in driving these countries into the arms of the more industrialized countries. The present attitude may be merely another extension of the new kind of economic offensive initiated at the Moscow Economic Conference and in the Economic Commission for Europe. There has also been speculation that this is the opening gun in a renewed effort to revive their former campaign for "peaceful coexistence between the Communist and Capitalist economic systems."

6. Disregarding possible explanations for these changes in Soviet tactics, it seems certain that the Soviet attacks against developed countries of the Western world, particularly the United States, did not have the desired effect upon the under-developed countries in the Council. On the contrary, the Soviet bloc seem to have failed entirely in their efforts to accuse the industrialized countries of economic domination and exploitation of the under-developed countries. Not only were most of the representatives of American, Asian and Middle Eastern delegations unimpressed, but they even refused to rise to the challenge. Those who did speak, such as Chile and Iran, took the opportunity to side with the capitalist countries against their would-be protectors.

BRIDGING THE GAP

7. The apparent improvement in relations between the delegations of the under-developed countries and those of the industrialized countries might be attributed to many causes. The representatives of some of the industrialized nations might claim a share in the credit for this accomplishment. At the same time, however, it would be honest to recognize that many of the agreements which have so far been reached at this session would not have been attained if the under-developed countries had not consented to put some water in their wine. It was significant, for instances, that the delegations from the under-developed countries were those which proposed the basic compromise resolution on the International Development Fund. Considering that this had been their pet project, and that they went to disturbing extremes in the General Assembly to muster a majority in support of their resolution, the question then arises as to whether the change of attitude is due to opportunism or to a greater spirit of realism and maturity.

8. Their readiness to accept the establishment this year of another Committee of Experts may have been dictated by political expediency. Their spirit of cooperation may be more apparent than real, and we may find ourselves in just as difficult a position next year, as we would have been at this session if they had decided to press forward. They might have felt that they had won a Pyrrhic victory in Paris, or they might have realized that a forced decision immediately prior to a Presidential election in the United States would have been inopportune.

9. Nevertheless, whether or not they have felt that delaying tactics at this stage would serve their interests better, it would seem that they have recognized the inevitable, and that they have held back from pursuing a policy which would have brought about a lining up of countries into hostile camps. It is also possible that they might have come to the conclusion that they are better off with the assistance they are already receiving through bilateral agreements, than they would otherwise be, were they to have to share with all under-developed countries, the resources of an International Fund. On this point, there is a strong possibility that Canadian participation in the Colombo Plan has had a salutary effect on recipient governments in their attitude towards external capital assistance. The Pakistan delegation in particular, has shown an awareness to the special problems involved in an economic development programme and an understanding and good-will towards countries, which could be the result of their government's present experience in administering Colombo Plan aid.

10. The "rapprochement" between the two classes of delegations may also be due in part to a less fiery enthusiasm on the part of the representatives of the under-developed countries. The aggressiveness which was prevalent in the days of Mr. Santa Cruz and others is now less apparent. This may be, of course, just the result of the absence of those who had been in the past the primary instigators of this aggressiveness and enthusiasm.

ROLE OF CANADIAN DELEGATION

11. It is a difficult task to assess just how much influence the Canadian Delegation has had so far during the first part of the 14th Session. In any event, we can at least say that the Canadian Delegation has made very special efforts in the Council and its Committees to improve the relations between the under-developed countries and the more industrialized countries, and has concentrated on this particular aim in its behind-the-scenes consultations. The members of the Canadian Delegation have leaned over backwards in efforts to convince representatives of under-developed countries that our basic objectives were the same, and that both sides should be anxious to compromise on the means and on the methods. The issues on which we have tried to be helpful might actually be small ones, but they are of the types which have proved in the past to be the greatest sources of irritation and disaccord, if no special efforts were made to "bridge the gap".

CONCLUSION

12. It is easy to be cynical about the accomplishments of the United Nations. There has been little by way of concrete achievements at this session which would help to dissipate this growing sense of cynicism. However, if we accept the view that any improvement in the general atmosphere might facilitate the work of the Council, there may be some ground for encouragement about the future role of the Council. Although certain delegations have at times been inclined to look upon the Chairman of the Council as too weak and too indecisive, the Canadian Delegation feels that by his patient understanding and friendly manner, Mr. Amjad Ali has not been entirely unconnected with that new tendency. It is even possible that his business background has influenced his own delegation and others towards a greater sense of practical realism. As to how genuine, however, are the causes to which this slight shift might be attributed and as to how long they will continue to influence the behaviour of the majority of the members of the Council, these are other questions that only subsequent sessions will be able to answer.

ASSESSMENT OF SECOND HALF OF 14TH SESSION OF ECOSOC

1. As the Canadian Delegation of the 14th Session of ECOSOC had done for the First Half of the Session, it has prepared an Assessment of the various trends which have characterized the Second Half of the Session. Copies of this Second Assessment, the general contents of which have been concurred in by the members of the Delegation who were still in New York at the conclusion of the Session, are attached.

2. You will note that the object of this Assessment is again mainly to give an appreciation of the general atmosphere which has prevailed during the Second Half of the Session, and to set down the impressions which the Delegation has formed as to the broad policies being pursued by particular groups of countries, in particular the Communist bloc and the under-developed countries. As a report of only part of the Session, it does not attempt to draw definite conclusions which we hope to be able to do to some extent when we prepare the overall evaluation of the 14th Session.<sup>92</sup>

du Conseil économique et social, New York, 1952*

Assessment of the Second Half of the Fourteenth Session of the Economic and Social Council, New York, 1952

1. In our assessment of the first half of the 14th Session of ECOSOC, we stated that there had been a distinct change from the atmosphere which had prevailed during the two preceding sessions held in Santiago and Geneva. We indicated in particular that there had been less acrimony and fewer exchanges of bitter propaganda between the Communist bloc and other countries, and that the under-developed countries had not attempted to overstate their case. We can say that this statement is in general true for the second half of the 14th Session of the Council, although some minor qualifications should be made in respect of the attitude of the under-developed countries.

2. As they had done during the first half of the Session, the Communist delegations never failed on every issue to state uncompromisingly their established position. There were, however, during the second half of the Session occasional attempts on the part of the United States and the United Kingdom delegations to take some initiative in the propaganda field and to attack the Communists; but even then, the delegations of the Soviet bloc limited themselves to restating their case without vituperation, and certainly in a form much milder than might have been expected.

3. There was, of course, nothing to indicate that the basic Soviet stand towards the U.N. and its specialized agencies has suffered any transformation. Their attitude of indifference, or in certain cases, of antagonism, towards the specialized agencies would in fact seem to have remained completely unchanged. In line with this attitude towards the specialized agencies, they insisted on a general policy of more direct action by the Council in fields now occupied by the specialized agencies. The proposals put forward to that effect cannot be regarded as practical, but are no doubt considered by the Soviet group as having some propaganda value; since they assist them in their efforts to minimize the contributions of the capitalist countries in the economic and social fields, and support their claim that they, and they alone, have the answers to all the various ailments from which the world is suffering. Though not marked by excessive acrimony, their statements made it nonetheless clear that, in their view, the capitalist countries, and in particular the United States, did not have, nor could be expected to have in the future, a remedy to the present economic and social problems. It should be incidentally noted that the delegations of the Soviet bloc did not lose the opportunity to express their sympathies, wherever practicable, for the policies favoured by the under-developed countries.

4. The agenda of the Council for the second half of the Session unlike that of the first half, did not contain any major controversial items, on which we can accurately assess the attitude of the representatives of the under-developed countries. In these circumstances, it is somewhat difficult to assert that their cooperative attitude, which we had observed during the first half of the Session, really continued until the end of the Session.

5. There were, however, several minor items in connection with which the representatives of the under-developed countries assumed a less cooperative attitude and about which they did not hesitate to have recourse to their voting majority or even to associate themselves with the Soviet group, in order to force the acceptance of their views or their candidates. Their desire to have their own candidates elected to the Permanent Central Opium Board blinded them to the desirability of re-electing to the Board the old members of the Board, who had served devotedly for many years and who had acquired a vast and useful experience. Their stand with regard to the election of a rapporteur for the question of Freedom of Information — before as well as after the election — pointed undeniably to a disturbing determination to put their own man in the position at all costs. Their decision to include in the list of priorities the obligations of the industrialized nations in the field of economic assistance and their simultaneous insistence to delete those obligations which would normally fall upon the under-developed countries and their reluctance in the Technical Assistance Committee to support an appeal for payment of arrears of contributions, after two weeks of urging a considerable expansion of the Technical Assistance Programmes, are other reasons why we feel we should qualify our earlier assessment. Although their position was equally firm on the question of self-determination, this stand cannot, of course, be looked at in the same light since the problem affects deeply entrenched national policies on which compromises on the substance can hardly be expected.

6. From the point of view of achievements, the accomplishment of the ECOSOC during the second half of the Session confirmed our initial impression that this 14th Session should be remembered as a Session devoted to consolidation of undertakings already begun. It gave consideration to major problems within its responsibility, reviewed the work accomplished by its specialized agencies, and its functional commissions, and requested further studies on those questions which were still not ripe for a final decision. The 14th Session is therefore not a Session of spectacular accomplishments but one which, nonetheless, fulfilled a necessary and useful task, namely to keep the wheels turning. At the same time, the experience of this Session perhaps suggests the possibility of more friendly and more fruitful discussions in the Council when propaganda is kept out of the debates.

7. We recognize, however, that an even less optimistic assessment of the work and the future of the Council might be justified, and refer you to the following paragraph of the statement by the President of the Council, Mr. Amjed Ali, of Pakistan, at the conclusion of the 14th Session:

“The uppermost impression left on the mind is that we have postponed definite action to the future and have, by and large, contented ourselves with arrangements for preparatory activities. By this, I do not mean that I am dissatisfied with the Council’s work during this session or that the postponement of action could have been avoided. Rather I am expressing an awareness of the fact that the pressing problems of the world in the fields of economic development, of international trade and of monetary instability and inflation have created an atmosphere of urgency of action. Under these circumstances, it is perhaps too much to expect that the appointment of still another group of experts to study a problem, the arrangement for the preparation of still another report concerning a question, the postponement of action until the Secretary-General has had an opportunity to prepare still another working paper would universally be accepted as the utmost that can be done by the Economic and Social Council. It is this Council which, under the Charter of the United Nations and under the authority of the General Assembly, is entrusted with the promotion of conditions of stability and well-being necessary for peaceful and friendly relations among nations. It would be doing less than my duty if I did not at this time express my belief that both the authority and the prestige of the Economic and Social Council may become impaired if in several important fields it does not quickly succeed in translating the findings and conclusions of its many studies and reports into action designed to implement the economic and social objectives of the Charter. I can say this more freely as we are completing our third year in the Council.”

8. With reference to the role which the Canadian Delegation fulfilled during the second half of the Session, we may confirm that the Delegation continued during the second half the same policy of trying to improve the relations between the developed and under-developed countries. Behind-the-scenes consultations again proved the more practical way to carry out this policy. As a result, the Canadian Delegation was probably at times instrumental in modifying unacceptable proposals and substituting others with a more realistic approach.

4. Mr. Wershof. The Disarmament Commission, established recently by the United Nations to replace the former Commission for Conventional Armaments and Atomic Energy Commission, has held a number of meetings during March. Mr. Johnson presided under the system adopted by the Commission, of monthly rotation of the chairmanship. A large portion of the time was devoted to pointless if spectacular discussion of the Soviet charge that the U.S. has used bacteriological warfare in Korea. Further discussion of this issue was finally ruled out of order by Mr. Johnson on the ground that dealing with such charges was outside the Commission's terms of reference. This ruling was supported by all but the Soviet representative. The Commission has now adopted a plan of work, under which the two most important items — disclosure and verification, and regulation of all armaments and armed forces — are to be dealt with concurrently. These problems will be studied initially in committee. The U.S. has presented a working paper setting out a detailed plan for the progressive disclosure and verification of information concerning all armed forces and armaments. Delegations have not yet had time to obtain the views of their governments on this document.

New York, April 25, 1952

SECRET

DISARMAMENT COMMISSION — SOME SUGGESTIONS FOR BREAKING THE DEADLOCK

Reference: Our teletype No. 224 of April 25.†

1. After one of the recent meetings of the Disarmament Commission, Mr. Jakob Malik, the Soviet Representative, leaned heavily across the conference table and said to a member of the Secretariat, "Well, do you think we are getting anywhere?" The discouragement implied in that question is, I am sure, shared by all members of the Disarmament Commission. We are obviously not getting anywhere; and it is very unlikely that we shall get anywhere before the deadline for our first report, June 1. I think that the best we can aim at now is to cultivate the ground in the hope that something will bloom before the end of the summer when we shall have to submit our findings to the General Assembly. Other delegations share our feeling that June 1 need not be regarded as too important a deadline and that we should concentrate our efforts towards having something real to report to the next General Assembly.

2. With this in mind, the United States, United Kingdom, French and Canadian delegations have held a series of meetings recently on which I have reported only briefly by teletype. At our most recent meeting yesterday afternoon, April 24, we got closer to the root of the matter than at any previous time. I think it would be appropriate if I now tried to set out the main lines of approach which seem to be developing.

3. The Elements of the Deadlock

Before discussing the views of other delegations as to how the present deadlock might be broken, I might go over briefly the elements of the deadlock which have been particularly apparent during the meetings of the Disarmament Commission to date.

4. The essence of the deadlock has not changed very much during the past few years. Neither the Soviet Union nor the United States wish to yield those elements of military strength in which they are predominant in the early stages of any disarmament programme. The Soviet Union therefore will not agree to lowering the curtain of secrecy surrounding their military power in return for being told what they already know in considerable detail about western military power. The United States, on the other hand, will not agree to give up any significant information about atomic energy, still less prohibit the bomb, while Soviet mass armies are in a position to overrun Western Europe and the Middle East. The Western Powers therefore give priority in the Disarmament

Commission to a examination of "safeguards" — principally disclosure and verification by stages — whereas the Soviet Union calls for an immediate "decision" to prohibit weapons of mass destruction and reduce armaments and armed forces of the major Powers by one-third. Without some kind of "decision" on prohibition and reduction, the Soviet Union fears that the Western disarmament scheme will never get beyond collecting military information and will never arrive at the prohibition of weapons of mass destruction nor the reduction of armaments and armed forces. We fear that the "decision" they propose would be empty and delusory without safeguards to back it up.

5. Analysis or Synthesis

It is interesting to see how national habits of mind are reflected in the ways in which different delegations think our problem should be tackled. Mr. Moch,<sup>93</sup> for example, has been making, both in and out of the Commission, remarkably lucid and comprehensive studies of the situation as a whole. His approach is comprehensive and logical. By working out a skeleton draft treaty covering in broad terms the steps we propose for reaching general disarmament, he thinks that we might give Mr. Malik more concrete assurance that the western proposals would, in fact, be carried out to the stage of reduction and prohibition and would not be halted after some degree of disclosure and verification.

6. My Dutch and United Kingdom colleagues, on the other hand, prefer a more analytical approach. They would like to tackle manageable bits of the problem and only subsequently try to make a comprehensive whole from the component parts. They would like therefore to avoid working on a draft treaty to be submitted to a world conference of all states until Mr. Malik shows some interest in such particular subjects as the West regards as touchstones of Soviet sincerity, e.g. effective international inspection.

7. Atomic and Conventional Weapons — A Single Package

The Western Delegations are all agreed that it has become essential to keep together atomic and conventional disarmament. Although there might be some minor steps that could be taken in one field or the other, nothing important could be done in either field unless there was a corresponding advance in the other.

8. A few years ago, as I recall, the Department reached this conclusion on the grounds that it would be unsafe for the West to relinquish its atomic superiority until the free world had a parity with the Soviet world in other forms of weapons and armed forces. Today we are perhaps closer to parity with the Soviet bloc in conventional weapons and armed forces, but there is now another reason compelling us to keep the two aspects of the subject together as two sides of the same coin.

Jules Moch, Member of Parliament of France; Representative, Delegation to the Sixth Session of the General Assembly.

9. If the majority plan for atomic control were put into effect tomorrow, it would be impossible to ensure that either side was declaring its entire stock pile of atomic weapons. In 1946 and 1947 there were very few bombs in existence. Now there are many; and they are not all on one side. No amount of accounting and back-checking could determine for sure that substantial stock piles of bombs were not being withheld from the International Control Authority.

10. For this reason, Western Delegations here believe that the only condition on which it would be safe for the free world to agree even to the majority plan for the control of atomic energy would be if it were coupled with a plan for comprehensive and balanced disarmament in other fields, with appropriate safeguards to make sure it was carried out. An undeclared stock pile of atomic weapons would be much less dangerous in the hands of a state which did not have the capacity, in terms of conventional forces and weapons, to exploit any sudden use of its concealed atomic weapons. In an article in the Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists for March, which has been widely read here, Professor Cavers has used this fact as an argument for loosening up the plan of the majority for atomic controls. I think his argument is justified, but it is perhaps even more to the point to observe that this fact makes any plan for atomic control without general disarmament very dangerous. In that sense, the stakes in the Disarmament Commission are perhaps even higher than they were in the days of the Atomic Energy Commission and the Commission for Conventional Armaments.

11. It is pretty plain that the Soviet Government realizes the present ambiguity and dangers (from the point of view of the West) in the majority plan for atomic energy. Mr. Cohen<sup>94</sup> has told me that during the last session of the General Assembly in Paris Mr. Malik had asked him privately one day what would happen if the USSR were suddenly to accept the majority plan as it stands. Mr. Cohen said that he was somewhat at a loss for a reply but said, "Try it and see."

12. French Ideas

Mr. Moch has proved himself the most effective debater on the western side in the Disarmament Commission. Although his logic has occasionally carried him well off the ground of reality, his has been the most fertile mind in producing new ideas which he has been quite ready to discuss with us privately and modify in the light of our comments. At present he is chiefly worried by the United States proposal of five stages for disclosure and verification (Document DC/C.2/1 forwarded with our letter No. 350 of April 9).† He does not see how we can defend a position which discloses very little information of real value in the atomic field until the completion of the fifth and final stage and which would require that everything of military value be disclosed and verified before anything is reduced or prohibited.

Benjamin V. Cohen, Alternative Representative, Delegation of the United States to the Sixth Session of the General Assembly.

13. Although he feels unhappy about the whole concept of "stages", he thinks it would be an improvement if the five United States stages were compressed into three and made more logical in their subject matter. His scheme for doing so, now approved by the French Government, was sent to you under cover of my letter No. 435 of April 25.† As you will see, he has made no attempt to say what atomic information should be disclosed in any one of his three stages and he has asked Mr. Cohen to have his experts fill in that side of the picture. Mr. Cohen said that he would be glad to see what could be done but doubted very much whether the atomic stages could be compressed into three steps, although he thought it might be possible to do it in four stages.

14. Apart from the question of whether there are three stages or five, Mr. Moch believes that some degree of reduction or limitation of forces would have to take effect during the stages rather than at the end of them. From the practical point of view, he doubts whether any European Parliament would vote money for continuing to expand the armed forces of their country after the successful completion of even the first stage of a disarmament programme of disclosure and verification. In effect, he thinks that whatever the rights and wrongs of the matter, there would have to be a general "freeze" towards the end of the first stage. In other words, armed forces and armaments would not be increased after that point and actual reduction might begin after the second stage (in the French programme) had been completed. Although he hesitates to venture into the atomic field, Mr. Moch did suggest to us privately that he personally thought there should be, perhaps at the end of the first stage, a six months "stop" on the operation of all atomic plants of any description, to make possible the completion of the second and third stage, by which time prohibition of atomic weapons would come into effect. (The idea of a "stop" on atomic production has, of course, been suggested before — notably by General Rómulo,<sup>95</sup> if I am not mistaken, during the General Assembly of 1949.)

15. From Mr. Tiné, the Counsellor of the French Delegation advising Mr. Moch, we have learned that Mr. Moch has been impressed by the arguments of Professor Cavers, to whose article in the Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists I have already referred. Mr. Moch has hinted in his statements in the Disarmament Commission and has suggested to us privately in more explicit terms that it should be possible to redefine our concept of international control in terms which might retain the substance of management but under the label of inspection. He points out that "control" means much less in French than in English and the French Delegation has never been satisfied with the United States concept of ownership in trust. This is not implied by the word "control" in French, which, he says, means only a general kind of supervision or loose management which might be effectively carried out through a thorough-going inspection system. It is, I suppose, true that in practice the inspectors of an international control agency would virtually manage the operations of atomic establishments if the international control agency had the power to set "safe" levels of operation — i.e. levels which would meet the legitimate peaceful requirements of a country but would not permit of large scale production which could be diverted to military purposes. This, I know, is a somewhat slippery argument, and I am sure that Mr. Moch himself is quite conscious of the dangers for he has not pressed it in our private discussions.

16. In our private talks, Mr. Moch constantly returns to the subject of Germany. He continues to display, as he did as Defence Minister during the NATO meetings in the fall of 1950, a lively concern about any possible German rearmament, whether in the context of the European defence community or not. This, I suspect, is the clue to Mr. Moch's eagerness to open up every possible avenue which might lead to some genuine disarmament. He even told the French Chamber of Deputies on February 12, before leaving for New York, that he hoped no irretrievable step would be taken in relation to the rearmament of Western Germany until the Disarmament Commission has had a chance to show whether or not there was any possibility of reaching agreement with the USSR on a general level of armaments which would be sufficiently low that no German rearmament would be required. From what he has said, I have the impression that Mr. Moch will be prepared to acquiesce in the creation of a European Army including German units if he convinces himself here that no agreement with the USSR is possible. But first he is bound he is going to have a good try.

17. The United States Ideas

Mr. Cohen also, I believe, genuinely wants to see the Disarmament Commission making progress, but he is much more skeptical of the chances of anything substantial coming out of it this year. Necessarily mindful of the United States elections, he seems to be primarily concerned with the effect of the Disarmament Commission on public opinion both here and abroad, and his main proposals seem, to me at least, to be tailored principally to that end. Although his querulous manner of speaking does not carry much weight, he has been more effective in his private talks with other delegations in which he has demonstrated his sincerity and his readiness to listen carefully to other points of view.

18. Mr. Cohen deprecates the preoccupation of the public and many officials with the atomic side of our disarmament problem. He sees that it is natural that those who have worked closely with the Atomic Energy Commission should think more in terms of atomic than conventional disarmament, but he is afraid that if we continue to concentrate on "atomics" we shall be playing into Soviet hands. The Soviets, Mr. Cohen says, have always wanted to use discussions in the U.N. to draw attention to the "aggressive atomic diplomacy" of the United States, whereas it is in the interests of the West to concentrate public attention on Soviet mass armies which are the real danger to peace.

19. Although Mr. Cohen realizes that nothing substantial can be done in the conventional field without some parallel step in the atomic field, he thinks that it might be possible to take the size of the armed forces of the Great Powers as one problem in which you could get a balanced reduction without necessarily involving other aspects of disarmament. In other words, he hopes to be able to propose that all states having substantial military forces should agree to reduce their armed forces to fixed maximum levels based on an initial level of 1 percent of their population, with minor adjustments as necessary to meet special cases. States having a population in excess of 150 million, however, should accept an initial maximum level of 1,500,000 for their armed forces. The text of Mr. Cohen's draft proposals was sent to you in our teletype No. 224 of April 25.†

20. Mr. Cohen is, as you will see, proposing that the initial reduction to the above levels should follow the completion of the first step of disclosure and verification when an international control organ would be in existence and would already have some material to go on.

21. Mr. Cohen's proposal would not exclude parallel steps being taken in the atomic field on the basis of the majority plan, but his proposal for reducing armed forces could, he thinks, be put into effect independently of any progress in the atomic field.

22. As Sir Gladwyn Jebb and Mr. Moch have been quick to point out to Mr. Cohen in private, Mr. Cohen's plan might be interpreted to permit the armed forces of the United States, United Kingdom and France to exceed those of the Soviet Union — a proposal which is not likely to appeal to the Soviet Government, especially when it is not combined with any plan (other than the majority plan) for the prohibition of weapons of mass destruction. Sir Gladwyn Jebb has suggested that it would not be necessary to tie such a scheme to the United States stages for disclosure and verification but that it might be put forward quite independently and with modifications which would result in a closer balance between the forces which would remain on both sides if the plan were put into effect.

23. In this connection, Mr. Cohen does not exclude the possibility of the population figures for the United Kingdom and France being based on their metropolitan populations plus one-third or one-half of the population of their dependent territories. This would have the effect of slightly reducing the present military establishment of the United Kingdom and leaving the French Armed Forces approximately where they are now, giving both together an establishment of 1,500,000 men.

24. According to the rough calculations of General Dimoline, the United Kingdom member of the Military Staff Committee, the United States proposals, with the modification suggested by Mr. Cohen for dealing with the populations of dependent territories, might give approximately the following results on both sides: United States: 1,500,000 U.S.S.R.: 1,500,000 United Kingdom: 750,000 Communist China: 1,500,000 France: 750,000 Satellites: 700,000 Other NATO and old Commonwealth countries: 700,000 Total: 3,700,000 Total: 3,700,000

Although the Soviet Union would be asked to reduce its own forces by a considerably larger percentage than the United States, a rough balance on both sides would result from the application of the United States formula which, of course, bears a close resemblance to the criteria which were being considered by both the United States and United Kingdom Governments before the tripartite proposals for disarmament were presented to the General Assembly in Paris last November.

25. The plan would, incidentally, permit an expansion of the Canadian armed forces.

26. Mr. Cohen is fully alive to the propaganda, or counter-propaganda, advantages of his proposal. If nothing more substantial can be proposed by the United States Government this year, he believes it is perhaps advantageous to make a simple and resounding proposal which will undercut the Soviet proposal for a one-third reduction in the armed forces of the Great Powers. Mr. Cohen has told us that he thinks it would be very difficult for Soviet propaganda to back-water in rejecting his proposal which would cut the armed forces of the two principle powers not by one-third but by upwards of one-half. It would help to fill in the conventional side of our disarmament work which, as I have said, Mr. Cohen thinks is being neglected; and it would at the same time draw public attention to Soviet mass armies rather than to United States atomic bombs.

27. What evidently struck Mr. Moch most forcibly when Mr. Cohen presented his draft plan for the reduction of armed forces to us, was that if the United States were to reduce its armed forces to 1,500,000 men, it would almost inevitably have to withdraw the bulk of the forces it now has in Western Europe and Asia. This is naturally a thought that must haunt the minds of European statesmen and I should not like to minimize its importance; but in a world in which the Soviet Union had only 1,500,000 men under arms, I should not think that Western Europe would have too much cause for alarm, provided the USSR was not in a position to mobilize rapidly and secretly large reserves.

28. As regards the atomic side, Mr. Cohen has defended the majority plan as staunchly among us in New York as I suspect he has urged some study of possible revisions in Washington. He has told us privately that, quite apart from the domestic political situation in the United States, the experts in Washington regard the loss of a United States monopoly and the growth of large stock piles of bombs on both sides as requiring not a less rigid but a more rigid plan for the international control of atomic energy. If the dangers of evasion are now greater because international control can no longer be introduced before many bombs have been made, the United States experts argue, it makes it all the more necessary to insist on full management and ownership of all atomic energy installations.

29. Another argument which Mr. Cohen has been using privately is that until the time comes when the Soviets give us some indication that they are ready to negotiate seriously, until Mr. Malik shows some real interest in getting down to details in discussing safeguards with us, it would be premature to try to revise the majority plan along the lines of some "inspection only" proposal. The majority plan is now generally supported by public opinion in the United States, but the support which has been built up not without difficulty would be jeopardized by any one-sided concessions which would be bound to be regarded by United States public opinion as a betrayal of trust and represented as tying the hands of the United States Government while leaving the U.S.S.R. a free hand.

30. United Kingdom Ideas

In their defence of the majority plan and nothing less than the majority plan, the Foreign Office are at least as firm as the State Department. The United Kingdom Delegation agree to the hilt with Mr. Cohen when he says that it would be the greatest mistake for one of us to imply in the Disarmament Commission that we were ready to move from the majority plan until we had agreed among ourselves, after very careful thought, on some equally effective alternative plan.

31. Perhaps for that reason, Sir Gladwyn Jebb has not displayed the same enthusiasm in the hunt for new ideas as Mr. Moch. On the other hand, he has appeared less concerned than Mr. Cohen over the "public relations" aspects of our work. He has tried rather to keep both feet on the ground and see that any proposals put forward on the Western side were solid and free from implications which might be dangerous.

32. In commenting on Mr. Cohen's draft proposals for a reduction of armed forces, Sir Gladwyn Jebb said that his Government are seriously thinking about parallel proposals. From his adviser, Mr. Laskey, we have since found out privately a little more of what the Foreign Office may have in mind.

33. Starting from the proposition that it would be desirable to have as a basis for negotiation some idea of what each government would regard as the minimum level of its armed forces essential for its own security, the Foreign Office are considering a rather complicated formula which would break down the figure of minimum forces required into its component elements for police, metropolitan and overseas responsibilities. They might suggest a questionnaire being circulated to members of the Disarmament Commission asking them what minimum forces they would require in these categories on the assumption that their neighbours were also to disarm and that all weapons of mass destruction were to be effectively prohibited. They would then foresee a series of negotiations between states based on the answers to the above questionnaire, as they recognize that the forces any given state will need for its internal security will largely depend on the forces needed by its neighbours.

34. If the United Kingdom Delegation put forward a "minimum forces," questionnaire, they will probably not tie it to any system of stages. In fact, they are not altogether happy with stages proposed by the United States, in particular, the proposal that aerial surveys be conducted in stage 1. Not only will this be totally unacceptable to the U.S.S.R., but even the United Kingdom Government might hesitate to agree to have its many military bombing targets photographed during the first stage before either side would have any real security. They would therefore prefer a more modest definition of stage 1 — or, on the other hand, a much more radical proposal for the completion of the entire system of stages quickly so that some measure of actual disarmament might fairly soon and surely follow aerial surveys.

35. Conclusions

"Conclusions" is perhaps not the best word to describe the few paragraphs which follow because there are in fact few conclusions expressed.

36. As you will have seen from the foregoing review of our disarmament discussions, I have not taken a leading part in them. Although I have done my best to obtain information from the three Western Powers about their views in order to report them accurately to you, I have not been active in putting forward ideas of my own. This is partly because we have not yet received instructions and partly because I have not made up my own mind as to the best course to follow.

37. It seems to me that there are two main problems facing us, namely (a) the concessions which might eventually be made, and (b) the timing of these concessions.

38. I suggest that we should now seriously consider what modifications might be made in:

- (a) the majority plan for the international control of atomic energy,
- (b) the U.S. working paper on disclosure and verification (in five stages) and
- (c) the U.S. working paper on essential principles for guiding the work of the Disarmament Commission.

39. As regards (a), I have been impressed with what Prof. Cavers says in the article which you drew to our attention, but I am handicapped by lack of technical knowledge of the subject. It would be interesting to know if our experts agree that the modifications in the majority plan which he suggests would not imperil our position. I refer particularly to his thesis that with adequate inspection machinery the provisions in the majority plan for ownership (and control) may not now be necessary, in a plan for general disarmament including not only atomic but conventional weapons, and armed forces.

40. As regards (b) and (c), I do not think that Mr. Cohen is particularly wedded to the idea of five stages, but it seems to me unlikely that Mr. Malik will be interested in discussing any proposal involving stages until there has been some kind of agreement in principle that when an international control system is ready to operate effectively there will be prohibition of weapons of mass destruction and limitation and reduction of armed forces and armaments. It is doubtful that the United States "principles" will be an acceptable substitute for what Mr. Malik has been calling a "decision" and some thought might be given to how far we could safely go in the direction of making a "decision" which would of course not be binding in any way until an effective international system of control was in operation.

41. As regards the timing of any concessions which we might eventually make, I have reached the tentative conclusion that nothing should be done until the Soviet representative indicates a wish to get down to serious business. Mr. Malik up to the present has produced no working paper and has made no suggestions which might be taken as a basis for discussion. With perhaps one important exception (paragraph 6 of my teletype No. 156 of April 4),† Mr.

Malik has not answered our questions about the Soviet "concessions" made in Paris last January on "simultaneity" and continuous inspection, although asking for concessions from us in the field of "ownership". He deliberately ignores, misstates or misinterprets statements and speeches by Western Delegations. His speeches have been an unrelieved record of abuse and vilification.

42. The effect of Mr. Malik's speeches have, I think, been to harden against him the opinions of us all. This is equally true, I think, of the Pakistani, Brazilian and Chilean members of the Disarmament Commission who might be inclined to take a middle position. It has been particularly useful having Mr. Moch here. At the beginning I think he perhaps more than anyone else hoped that real progress could be made. His line was conciliatory. He urged us to let Mr. Malik have his say in public if he wished and to avoid calling him strictly to order. Mr. Moch is by now pretty well discouraged. At the meeting of the Committee 2 on April 25, Mr. Malik, you will remember, rejected the U.S. paper for disclosure and verification out of hand. This shocked Mr. Moch. At the end of our meeting he pleaded with Mr. Malik to suggest some amendments or to present alternative proposals. If there is no answer to this plea, I imagine Mr. Moch will be even more discouraged than he now is. I cannot help feeling that Mr. Malik's tactics have boomeranged.

DESPATCH D. 311

Ottawa, May 9, 1952

SECRET

DISARMAMENT COMMISSION

We cannot afford not to take seriously the establishment of the Disarmament Commission and the task which the General Assembly has given it. Whether we like it or not, the two main aspects of this task, the substantive and the propaganda aspects, cannot be separated. Public opinion has tended to concentrate upon the question of disarmament as the most important issue arising at the recent session of the Assembly, and, in spite of past disappointments, to regard with cautious optimism the possibility that the Russians may be prepared to make genuine concessions along the lines suggested by Mr. Vishinsky and Mr. Malik. Our only long-term answer to the Soviet contention that the Western powers are unwilling to submit to any real prohibition of atomic weapons and reduction of armaments, regardless of whether that contention is sincere or not, is to do all in our power to bring the work of the Disarmament Commission to a successful conclusion. This in itself would furnish the most effective propaganda for the Western cause and if, having made a genuine constructive effort toward disarmament, unhampered by previous preconceptions, Soviet intransigence continues to bring the Commission's work to naught, we would then be in a position to ensure that opinion throughout the world understood the reason for failure. Past experience has led us to believe that the Soviet leaders are sensitive to world opinion.

2. It will not be sufficient for the Western powers merely to take a dogmatic stand on their previous position. We must make every effort, not only to secure the effective control of weapons of mass destruction and a balanced reduction of armaments and armed forces, but also to convince both the Russians and public opinion in general that this is our earnest aim. Any real progress toward the goal of disarmament can be measured only by the extent to which agreement can be achieved between the Soviet Union and the Western powers. It should therefore be the main objective of the Canadian Delegation to bring about such agreement, without sacrificing our national or collective security, and we should allow our methods to be as flexible as need be to achieve this objective. In this connection we should bear in mind, as I stated in Committee I of the General Assembly on November 21, 1951, that there must be a balance of risks and safeguards on both sides. It is clear, for example, that the U.S.S.R. will not agree to open the secrets of its military power to disclosure and verification in return for information it already has concerning Western military power, and that, on the other hand, the United States will not disclose any significant information about atomic energy or agree to prohibit the atomic bomb while Soviet mass armies are in a position to over-run Western Europe and the Middle East.

3. In view of these considerations, I believe that no general plan of disarmament is likely to have any prospect of success unless it not only deals at the same time with both conventional and atomic armaments but also incorporates all three segments of the problem: the "decision" to prohibit atomic weapons and reduce armed forces and armaments (regarded as essential by the U.S.S.R.); the "safeguards" of disclosure and verification of information on such weapons, armed forces and armaments (regarded as essential by the Western powers); and the "system of international control" which is essential to enforce the plan. As Mr. Malik has pointed out, disclosure and verification are not ends in themselves but are part of the whole field of regulation and control of armaments and armed forces. If necessary, we should be prepared to go on record in favour of the prohibition of the atomic bomb and other weapons of mass destruction and a balanced reduction of armaments and armed forces at such time as an effective system of international control is established by agreement among the major powers. Moreover, we need have no hesitation in making our agreement to a plan for disclosure and verification conditional upon similar agreement on regulation and control.

4. It would scarcely be appropriate for Canada, with its limited experience in the maintenance of large scale military establishments, to prepare in detail a general disarmament plan, but we might contribute to such a plan with respect to atomic control. There are in the article by Professor Cavers in the March issue of The Bulletin of Atomic Scientists some ideas which we consider worthy of detailed study. We therefore intend to re-examine the provisions of the majority plan concerning ownership and operation of facilities with a view to working out possible modifications on those points.

5. In line with this positive approach we should strive to make the Disarmament Commission into a working body rather than a forum. It should be made clear, both to the Soviet representative and to the public, that we are in earnest about the serious purpose of the Commission and that we believe it can do constructive work if it concentrates on its terms of reference, but that the quickest way to thwart that purpose is to indulge in mere propaganda. An effort should be made to restrict the public sessions of the Commission as much as possible and to persuade it to do its work in closed committee. If it is then found necessary to issue public statements concerning the Commission's work, the reports should not be designed to cover the substance of the discussions but only to indicate in the most general terms such progress as has been made. I suggested in the House of Commons on April 1 that while international covenants should be made public, they may often be better negotiated in confidence, provided the principles and purposes of the negotiations have been made known. I should therefore like to see the Disarmament Commission's committees operate like the four-power subcommittee established by Committee I of the recent General Assembly, and not like most of the "secret" discussions which are being conducted at Panmunjom where the practice has been to tell the press everything, thus foregoing the advantages of secret diplomacy.

6. In spite of these efforts, however, the Disarmament Commission may make little or no headway for the time being. We must face the fact that progress there depends in large part on the broad balance of power in the world between the Western powers and the Soviet Union and its allies. The Soviet leaders are unlikely to agree to any substantial disarmament or balanced reduction of armed forces unless they believe that they would thereby lose less than by continuing their present policy. Our purpose in building defensive strength in association with our allies in NATO is not only to deter and, if necessary, to defeat aggression, but also to reach such a position of strength that the Soviet Union will wish to negotiate with the Western world. We must therefore be ready to take advantage of any willingness the Soviet Union shows to discuss the outstanding issues which divide us, and the Disarmament Commission might provide a suitable meeting ground. For this reason there can be no particular deadline, such as June 1 or even the next session of the General Assembly, for completion of the Commission's task. It is more important that the Commission establish a reputation for serious and workman-like discussion. If it nevertheless becomes certain that the Commission will be perverted into a propaganda forum, it might be preferable to adjourn the Commission's work for the time being, making it clear why, rather than to run the risk of bringing the Commission into permanent disrepute.

DISARMAMENT COMMISSION

You will recall that Mr. Reid in his memorandum of May 10+ summarized the main problems that had arisen in connection with the work of the Disarmament Commission. Since then, the most important development has been the submission of the United States-United Kingdom-French proposal for the numerical limitation of all armed forces. The core of the proposal is contained in the following "working formula" which was suggested as a basis of discussion in the Commission:

a. "There should be fixed numerical ceilings for China, France, the USSR, the UK, and the US which should be worked out with a view to avoiding a disequilibrium of power dangerous to international peace and security among themselves or with other states and thus reducing the danger of war. It is tentatively suggested that the maximum ceilings for the USSR, the US and China should be the same and fixed at, say, between 1,000,000 and 1,500,000 and the maximum ceilings for the United Kingdom and France should be the same and fixed at, say, between 700,000 and 800,000."

b. "For all other states having substantial armed forces there should be agreed maximum ceilings fixed in relation to the ceilings agreed upon for the Five Powers. Such ceilings should be fixed with a view to avoiding a disequilibrium of power dangerous to international peace and security in any area of the world and thus reducing the danger of war. The ceilings would normally be less than one percent of the population. Moreover, they should be less than current levels except in very special circumstances."

2. The part of this formula of direct interest to Canada is that which would limit Canadian armed forces to "less than current levels" and "normally less than one percent of the population." Since Canada's armed forces are at present less than one percent of the population, the tripartite proposal, if it were to be put into effect, would presumably restrict the armed forces to their present numbers. There could hardly be any "very special circumstances" applying in our case; such circumstances would exist only where equal application of the general restriction to all the countries in a particular area of the world would create a disequilibrium of power dangerous to international peace and security. Our delegation in New York has made informal comments to the sponsoring delegations concerning the presentation of this proposal but it has not expressed any view on the substance. We are now consulting the Chiefs of Staff on this point.

3. The tripartite proposal was introduced on May 28 by Sir Gladwyn Jebb, the United Kingdom representative, who pointed out that it would entail a much greater cut (about fifty percent) in the armed forces of the Great Powers than would the Soviet proposal for a one-third reduction and would moreover apply (unlike the Soviet proposal) to all states having substantial armed forces. Mr. Cohen, the United States representative, and Mr. Moch, the French representative, made supporting statements emphasizing that this proposal was intended to deal with only one part of a comprehensive disarmament programme which would also include disclosure and verification of armaments and armed forces, regulation of armaments, prohibition of atomic weapons, and control of atomic energy.

4. In spite of the fact that this is the first really concrete proposal for disarmament which has yet been presented to the Commission, it has received remarkably little attention from the press. The explanation probably lies in the method of presentation for, although the actual submission by Jebb was excellent, the drafting of the proposal itself was wordy, repetitious and diffuse (the core of the proposal being buried in the middle of the paper), and there was little or no supporting publicity in Washington, London or Paris. As a result, the opportunity appears to have been lost, for the time being at least, of striking an effective blow against Soviet "peace" propaganda. However, this does not necessarily mean that a suitable occasion could not be found later, perhaps at the next session of the General Assembly, for launching this proposal in a simplified form with the publicity it deserves.

5. The lack of public attention to date may in part explain why Mr. Malik, the Soviet representative, after giving an initially cautious reception to the tripartite proposal, has since returned to the sort of purely negative criticism to which he has subjected every Western suggestion so far made in the Commission. Fundamentally the Soviet position is that any discussion on reduction of armed forces should be on the basis of the Soviet proposals. The following are Malik's main comments to date:

(a) The fixing of numerical ceilings on armed forces is not a reduction but only "legalization of the inflated armed forces of the three powers."

(b) Sea and air forces should be explicitly mentioned (this in spite of the fact that the proposal refers to "all armed forces") and the proportions between the three services should be fixed.

(c) The proposal should provide, not only for the reduction of armed forces, but also for the reduction of armaments and the prohibition of weapons of mass destruction, on which decisions should be taken simultaneously.

6. In view of the Soviet attitude, it is now being seriously considered by members of the Commission whether the Commission might be adjourned officially or unofficially during July and August and active work resumed in September. I assume that we would have no objection to such a course if it were generally acceptable.<sup>96</sup>

7. Besides trying to discredit the Western proposals, the Soviet tactics in the Commission have also been aimed at splitting the United States from its supporters, particularly the French. In this regard there exists, it should be noted, a potential danger in the difference of approach between the French and the United States representatives. Mr. Moch, unlike his colleagues on the Commission, is an active and contentious figure in French political life. He is, as you no doubt know, one of the still considerable group in France which regards the threat from a new German aggressiveness as greater than that from Soviet expansion. Perhaps for these reasons, he tends to take a shorter term and more urgent view of the Commission's task in the hope that, if an effective disarmament plan can be achieved, and with it some form of modus vivendi with the U.S.S.R., further progress along what he regards as the dangerous course of Western policy in Germany may be arrested. To this end he is prepared to make major concessions to the U.S.S.R. now in the hope of achieving immediate results. This is in sharp contrast to the United States position, which is that, until the U.S.S.R. demonstrates its readiness to discuss seriously the essential elements of a disarmament plan, it would be vain and even dangerous for the Western powers to make concessions. This difference of approach has shown itself so far in connection with the questions of disclosure and verification (where Moch was in favour of reducing the number of stages and disclosing atomic information earlier than the United States proposal suggested), the control of atomic energy (where Moch desires to review now the ownership provisions of the majority plan), and a disarmament treaty (where Moch would like to start now on the drafting of a comprehensive intergovernmental agreement).

8. If this divergence of view were to widen, it would clearly place other members of the Western alliance, including ourselves, in an awkward position, and we therefore have an interest in trying as far as possible to see that a moderate course is taken which can be supported by all the Western delegations. Canada has so far played a minor role in the Commission itself. However, our delegation in New York has participated in a number of informal discussions with the United States, United Kingdom and French delegations and there will undoubtedly be an opportunity in this informal forum to put forward a point of view which, while avoiding any hasty action that might endanger our security, would at the same time enable positive proposals to be put forward which would test the sincerity of the Soviet Union.<sup>97</sup>

DISARMAMENT COMMISSION

Reference: Our teletype No. 495 of August 13.

1. As the Security Council will be busy next month with the question of new members, most delegations hope that the work of the Disarmament Commission will have been largely completed by the end of this month with the adoption of a report to the General Assembly.

2. We have as yet made no comments on the tripartite proposals for fixing ceilings on armed forces. These proposals were submitted on May 28 and most other delegations have given at least their preliminary comments on them. Canada is one of the six permanent members of this commission. Our delegation has been the only one included in regular informal consultations with the United States, United Kingdom and French delegations. I therefore think that we should not remain silent on the major tripartite initiative taken in the commission.

3. The supplementary tripartite proposals introduced at our last meeting on August 12 will in all probability be further discussed next week. We shall therefore have an opportunity, if we wish to take it, of making a statement not only on the supplementary paper but on the general approach embodied in the May 28 proposals. As we said in paragraph 5 of our teletype No. 314 of May 27<sup>a</sup> asking for instructions, I think it would be hardly worth saying anything unless we could make a fairly definite statement that the tripartite approach to the problem commends itself to the Canadian Government. This would imply that the Canadian Government was, in the event of agreement among the other powers concerned, prepared to negotiate an agreement which would limit Canadian armed forces to no more than present levels or one percent of population. We would not be bound by such an agreement until the successive stages of negotiation — Big Five Conference, Regional Conferences, and World Conference — had been concluded and the treaty which emerged had been ratified by the major powers.

4. In view of the Soviet attitude in the Disarmament Commission and outside it, it may seem somewhat unreal to consider seriously our attitude to disarmament proposals. Nevertheless, other governments with which we are closely associated have managed to agree on some fairly far-reaching formulations and I think they might justifiably expect some Canadian support to be recorded for the Disarmament Commission's report which will be an important item on the agenda of the next General Assembly.

DISARMAMENT COMMISSION

Balanced Reduction and Limitation of Armed Forces and Conventional Armaments

In my memorandum of June 14, I described the United States-United Kingdom-French proposal for the numerical limitation of all armed forces which had been submitted to the Disarmament Commission on May 28, the reception it had been given, and some of the problems it raised. We have now held preliminary consultations with the Chiefs of Staff on the substance of this proposal, particularly as it affects Canada, and they have expressed the following views:

(a) that they agree with the intention of the proposal that numerical limitations on the armed forces of all militarily important states is an essential element of any disarmament programme;

(b) that it is necessary and desirable in such limitations to make a distinction between the armed forces of the five major military powers and those of all other states;

(c) that Canada should be prepared to accept, as part of a general disarmament plan, the ceiling which the tripartite proposal would impose on Canadian armed forces (either less than one percent of the population or less than current levels); and

(d) that the numerical limitation of armed forces is but one aspect of the disarmament question and that the success of disarmament would be dependent upon the working out of a suitable formula for control.

2. According to the Chiefs of Staff, the present service strength in Canada, including active reserve forces and the RCMP, is 162,039. This is, however, well below the ceiling at present authorized for these forces, which is 231,454. Thus, in the event of general agreement on a one per cent ceiling, not only the authorized ceiling for Canadian forces but also the actual present strength would have to be reduced.

3. With these elementary points clarified, we are now in a position to examine with the Chiefs of Staff in further detail some of the important implications of the tripartite proposals, such as:

(a) the proportion of the various services within the permitted level of armed forces;

(b) the types and volume of supporting armaments; and

(c) the timing of the reductions of armed forces and conventional armaments and their relationship to the other essential elements of a comprehensive disarmament plan.

4. You will recall that one of Mr. Malik's criticisms of the tripartite proposal was that it should explicitly mention sea and air forces and should specify how the totals of the armed forces under this plan would be distributed among the three services. The three sponsoring powers have themselves been conscious of the need to tackle this aspect of the problem and have been consulting together with a view to formulating an agreement approach. As a result, a working paper, originally drafted by the United States, has now been agreed with the United Kingdom and France and was submitted to the Disarmament Commission on August 12 as a supplement to the tripartite proposal. It suggests that the questions of the composition of permitted armed forces and the types and volume of supporting armaments should be worked out by the following procedure of negotiation:

(a) the five permanent members of the Security Council would reach tentative agreement on these questions, to be reviewed in the light of the results of subsequent regional conferences;

(b) these regional conferences might then be held, to be attended by all governments and authorities having substantial military forces in each region, for the purpose of reaching similar tentative agreement;

(c) these agreements might subsequently be embodied in a draft treaty drawn up at a world disarmament conference which would provide also for all the essential components of the disarmament programme.

5. We are consulting the Chiefs of Staff on this supplement to the tripartite proposal and are asking them in particular to undertake a study designed, in the first place, to work out for the particular case of Canada the proportion of the various services and the types and volume of supporting armaments which might be acceptable if the numerical ceilings suggested in the tripartite proposals were applied to the Canadian armed forces. We are also suggesting that it might be possible to deduce from such a study whether some kind of practical formula or formulae could be devised for general application and, if not, what preparations would be necessary to the success of a solution by negotiation along the lines suggested in the tripartite supplement.

Relationship to Other Elements of Disarmament

6. There still remains the major problem of how to relate the balanced reduction and limitation of armed forces and conventional armaments to the other essential elements of a comprehensive disarmament programme and to ensure that all elements are implemented in such a way as to restore confidence and prevent in the process the development of any disequilibrium of power dangerous to international peace. This problem is of course at the heart of any serious attempt to implement the disarmament proposals so far put forward by the Western Powers and bids fair to subject Western policy to considerable strain in the future.

7. The problem is acknowledged in the tripartite supplement. In the final paragraph, it is stated that the initial limitations or reductions in armed forces and permitted armaments and the initial steps toward elimination of prohibited armaments should commence at the same time, and that subsequent limitations and reductions should be synchronized with subsequent progress in elimination of prohibited armaments. This process would be supervised by an international control authority which should be established prior to the initiation of the programme. Thus, it is concluded, when the limitations and reductions in armed forces and permitted armaments provided by the treaty or treaties are completed, production of prohibited armaments will have ceased, existing stockpiles of prohibited armaments and facilities for their production will have been disposed of, atomic energy will be utilized for peaceful purposes only, and the international control authority will have assumed its full functions.

8. This poses the problem clearly enough but I venture to suggest that, in doing so and thus inviting more concrete proposals for its solution, the tripartite supplement merely aggravates the dilemma already facing Western policy. This dilemma, as I see it, consists of the following combination of facts:

(a) that the Governments of the Western Powers cannot afford to ignore the increasing pressure of public opinion<sup>98</sup> in favour of an agreed programme of disarmament and particularly the prohibition and elimination of atomic weapons and other weapons of mass destruction;

(b) that at the same time the Western Powers have become increasingly dependent on the atomic weapon for preservation of their security against the threat of Soviet aggression; and

(c) that the Western Powers wish to make clear to the Soviet Government both directly and indirectly that, with the present strength of their atomic armaments, they would be able to render prohibitive the cost to the Soviet Union of any outbreak of general war.

9. Thus, to meet this pressure of public opinion (and to wrest the propaganda initiative from the Soviet Union), the Western Powers have publicly embarked on consideration of a comprehensive disarmament plan but, having done so, they do not feel able to commit themselves to a specific blueprint until they can have some assurance that the Soviet Government is prepared to go along. Yet retention by the Western Powers of the propaganda initiative itself depends on a readiness to fill in the whole disarmament plan with specific and concrete proposals. Nor, it should be added, is it likely that Soviet intentions can really be put to the test without such specific proposals. Moreover, without more specific proposals, it is likely to become increasingly difficult to retain the solidarity of delegations, such as the French and the Pakistan, which have drafted proposals for comprehensive disarmament treaties, have discussed them with friendly delegations but have so far been strongly discouraged from putting them forward formally.

? [L.B. Pearson]

10. The dilemma is well illustrated in a memorandum on possible future developments in the Disarmament Commission (copy of which is attached) which has been prepared by the United Kingdom Officials Committee on Disarmament, which is the body on the official level responsible for making policy recommendations to Ministers. You will see that this is a disconcertingly frank document. The emphasis throughout is on the propaganda aspects of disarmament, which the authors seem to regard as the sole purpose of the Disarmament Commission in the foreseeable future. It is regarded as fundamental that the Western Powers could not consent to forego their advantage in atomic weapons until a very late stage in any disarmament process and that, therefore, they should even avoid consideration by the Disarmament Commission of any concrete or substantive proposals for a firm programme, a time-table, or a draft treaty. The authors admit, however, that the propaganda advantage of the Western initiatives so far has been lessened by Soviet accusations that the proposals cover only those parts of a disarmament programme which are to the Western advantage. On the basis of the Official Committee's views, the United Kingdom has now drafted a working paper (copy of which is attached) suggesting the general framework of a comprehensive treaty (or treaties) on disarmament. This working paper has been approved by the United Kingdom Cabinet and their delegation in New York has been discussing with other Western delegations the advisability of submitting this paper to the Disarmament Commission for inclusion in its report to the Assembly. The preliminary reaction of other delegations is that it might be unwise to introduce the United Kingdom paper at this stage, since it might invite amendments which would be designed to make it more specific and which would therefore put the Western Powers on the defensive. Our delegation in New York has asked for our views on this point. Do you agree that, for the reasons given above, it would be preferable if the United Kingdom did not table its paper for the time being at least?<sup>99</sup>

Proposals for a New Approach

11. It seems to me that the Western Powers are likely to find themselves in an embarrassing position on the question of disarmament at the forthcoming session of the General Assembly unless some way is found out of the dilemma to which I have referred. The Disarmament Commission will shortly be preparing its report to the Assembly and this, from present appearances, will contain concrete proposals on only two of the essential elements of a disarmament programme (disclosure and verification and the reduction of armed forces) and a general suggestion that the reduction of conventional armaments should be the subject of negotiation. This will hardly suffice to meet the inevitable and damaging Soviet criticism that the Western Powers have no intention of discussing seriously the more sensitive aspects of disarmament. In this situation there is a real danger that the divergence of

---

yes. [L.B. Pearson]

views which has already become apparent among the Western delegations in New York might widen and place a considerable strain on the Western alliance.<sup>100</sup>

12. A new approach is needed which would, as you have agreed, safeguard our security and at the same time enable positive proposals to be put forward which would test the sincerity of the Soviet Union. This, I suggest, might be found in a "horizontal" treatment of the constituent elements of a disarmament programme rather than the "vertical" treatment so far followed. Western planning has so far tried to cover separately each element (disclosure and verification, an international system of control, reduction of armed forces, etc.) throughout its implementation from the inception of the disarmament programme to the final stage. The drawbacks to this approach are obvious. Not only is it difficult, if not impossible, to foresee from the very beginning and make effective provision to meet every difficulty likely to arise throughout implementation of the disarmament programme, but each successive proposal loses a good part of its effectiveness because it covers only one segment of a problem which, by our own admission, must be dealt with as a whole.

13. My suggestion is that we should concentrate, to begin with, on a manageable "slice" of disarmament which would cut horizontally across all the aspects of disarmament and would thus embrace the first stage of all the essential elements of a disarmament programme. This "first slice" of disarmament should embody only as much or as little of each component element as would make a substantial beginning with the process of disarmament without endangering our security. Its contents would have to be so devised as to constitute in toto a reasonable balance of risks and safeguards for both the Western Powers and the Soviet bloc. It should include the following elements:

(a) the balanced reduction of armed forces (the tripartite proposal for the numerical limitation of armed forces might serve to cover this element of the "first slice");

(b) the balanced reduction of conventional armaments;

(c) the initial steps in the establishment of an effective international control of atomic energy to ensure the eventual prohibition of atomic weapons (for this purpose it will undoubtedly be necessary to re-examine the United Nations majority plan with a view to working out possible modifications of those provisions dealing with ownership and operation of facilities);

(d) the disclosure and verification of sufficient information on armed forces and armaments, including atomic weapons, to enable the "first slice" to be carried out (the first stage of the United States proposal on this subject might be adapted for this purpose); and

Pakistan?

France?

? [L.B. Pearson]

(e) the establishment of an embryo international control organ with sufficient staff and authority to ensure the implementation of the "first slice".

14. On these questions we should of course have to obtain military advice before specific proposals could be formulated. We should have to ascertain, for example, how much information on armed forces and conventional armaments would be considered equivalent to an amount of atomic information which we could disclose without prejudicing our security. We should also have to establish with greater precision than has so far been attempted some criteria for measuring the proportion of services and the types and volume of supporting armaments to be permitted within the reduced levels of armed forces. The aim would be to produce for all these elements of the "first slice" proposals sufficiently concrete to enable negotiations to be initiated between the Western Powers and the Soviet bloc. If hard bargaining between those Powers resulted in sufficient agreement, this agreement could then be embodied in a treaty drafted by a world disarmament conference. When and if the "first slice" were successfully completed, further slices might be similarly negotiated and incorporated in the treaty.

15. It would of course be desirable, if the maximum propaganda advantage is to be derived from this approach, to include as a preamble to the proposals for the "first slice" a general statement of the ultimate objectives to be achieved upon completion of the whole disarmament programme. This preamble might in fact be presented as the draft of the main disarmament treaty, with the agreed contents of each "slice" of disarmament embodied in an annex to the main treaty. It need not include any commitments additional to those to which the Western Powers have already subscribed in the disarmament resolution of the last Assembly and the statement of principles proposed by the United States in the Disarmament Commission. But, in stating in concrete terms both the ultimate objectives of the disarmament programme and how its first stage is to be accomplished, the Western Powers should be in a position to answer effectively any propaganda counterattack that might be made.

16. This approach would seem to have the following advantages:

(a) it would deal comprehensively with a problem which cannot safely be tackled in bits and pieces;

(b) at the same time it would not involve any commitment to a complete time-table (such as the United Kingdom fears) and would not attempt to bite off in the first slice more than the Western Powers consider consonant with their essential security;

(c) it would also be sufficiently concrete to put Soviet sincerity to a real test and would give an opportunity for the growth of confidence before further slices were undertaken;

(d) it would cut the ground from underneath the Soviet accusation that the Western Powers are unwilling to deal with the sensitive parts of disarmament; and

(e) it would place before public opinion an initiative which should satisfy those who genuinely seek alleviation of the present international tension.

17. If you agree that this approach is worthy of further consideration, I would suggest that we communicate our preliminary ideas to our delegation in New York, with a request for their comments. Perhaps you would wish them, in formulating their comments, to discuss these ideas informally with the United States and United Kingdom delegations. At the same time we might ask the Chiefs of Staff to undertake studies along the lines suggested in paragraph 14 above. Such studies probably could not be completed in time to present a concrete proposal to the Disarmament Commission before it prepares its report to the Assembly but, if our ideas commended themselves to other friendly delegations, it might be possible to formulate a joint initiative for presentation to the Assembly itself.

18. Meanwhile, I think it might also be advisable, if you agree, to seek Cabinet approval for the preliminary views contained in paragraph 1 above on the tripartite proposal for numerical limitation of armed forces. So far our delegation in New York has expressed no views on the substance of this proposal in the Disarmament Commission. However, since they have been included in regular informal consultations with the three sponsoring delegations, it might be embarrassing if they did not give at least general support to the tripartite proposal before the end of this month, when the Commission plans to complete its report to the Assembly.

DISARMAMENT COMMISSION

Following from the Under-Secretary, Begins: We fully agree that Canada should not remain silent on the tripartite proposal for numerical limitations of armed forces. We have, as I intimated in my teletype No. 239 of June 23,† been giving careful consideration not only to the tripartite proposal itself but to the whole approach of the Western Powers to the problem of disarmament with a view to developing a point of view which:

(a) would be sufficiently moderate to claim the support of all the Western delegations and to minimize the divergence of views that has already been revealed among them; and

Repeat to Washington No. EX-1735.

(b) would at the same time be sufficiently positive to test the sincerity of the Soviet Union without endangering our own security.

2. Far from considering that the Western proposals so far put forward were too far-reaching, we have been concerned that they might not be adequate to achieve these objectives. We have therefore delayed instructing you on the tripartite proposals until we could study them further in the general context of a comprehensive disarmament programme.

3. Another concern has been with regard to timing. In spite of the major importance of this tripartite initiative, little attempt was made to exploit its maximum propaganda effect and the public attention it received was disappointing. It therefore appeared advisable not to express only general and preliminary comments during the desultory debate which followed presentation of the proposals but to wait until we could make a fairly concrete contribution to the Commission's report to the Assembly.

4. The Minister has now studied suggestions for a new approach to the disarmament problem and has agreed that you should discuss them informally with the United States and United Kingdom Delegations before they are developed further. The memorandum outlining our ideas will be sent to you by next bag. We realize that they can probably not be developed sufficiently to present a firm proposal to the Commission before it completes its report to the Assembly but if they commend themselves to other friendly delegations, it might be possible to formulate a joint initiative for presentation to the Assembly itself.

5. In the meantime, it would be desirable for you to express support for the tripartite proposal for numerical limitation of armed forces before the Commission's report is prepared. Cabinet Defence Committee will be giving consideration next Tuesday, August 26, to the following recommendations, in which our Minister and the Chiefs of Staff concur:

(a) that the Canadian Government agrees with the intention of the proposal, that numerical limitations on the armed forces of all militarily important states is an essential element of any disarmament programme;

(b) that the Canadian Government considers it necessary and desirable in such limitations to make a distinction between the armed forces of the five major military powers and those of all other states;

(c) that Canada would be prepared to accept, as part of a general disarmament plan, the ceiling which the tripartite proposal would impose on Canadian armed forces (either less than one percent of the population or less than current levels); and

(d) that the numerical limitation of armed forces is but one aspect of the disarmament question and that the success of disarmament would be dependent upon the working out of a suitable formula for control.

6. I should therefore be grateful if you would plan to make a statement along these lines to the Commission sometime after Tuesday and I shall let you know as soon as these views have been approved.

I attach a copy of the memorandum for the Minister, dated August 14, to which I referred in my teletype under reference and which contains suggestions for a new approach to the disarmament problem. As intimated in that teletype, the Minister has approved the recommendations made in paragraph 18. The question in paragraph 11 has now become academic but you may wish to know that the Minister said he agreed with the view expressed therein.

2. I should therefore be grateful if you would discuss informally with the United Kingdom and the United States Delegations the ideas put forward in this memorandum. I should emphasize that we have not as yet worked out the details of proposals which might be put forward along these lines but are rather seeking an approach which might provide an agreed framework for detailed proposals. If the suggested approach commends itself, it will of course involve intensive military study of the component parts before concrete proposals can be put forward. It is our thought, however, that such studies might be sufficiently advanced by the time the forthcoming session of the General Assembly convenes that the proposed approach might be submitted to the Assembly with the suggestion that the Disarmament Commission be instructed to pursue its work along these lines next year.

3. Naturally I should also be most grateful for any comments you yourself may wish to make on these ideas.

4. In the meantime, we are asking the Chiefs of Staff to undertake studies along the lines suggested in paragraph 15 of the attached memorandum. Copies of this memorandum have also been sent to our Embassy in Washington and Canada House, London, for their information.

DISARMAMENT COMMISSION — CANADIAN SUGGESTIONS FOR A NEW "APPROACH"

Reference: Our teletype No. 591 of September 18,+ your letter D-585 of August 25 and your teletype No. 348 of September 4.+

1. In my teletype under reference I reported briefly on the rather discouraging replies of the United Kingdom and United States Delegations to our suggestions for a new approach based on the idea that the General Assembly might ask the Disarmament Commission to develop a "first slice" of a comprehensive disarmament programme. In this letter I should like to explain in greater detail the views of the United States, United Kingdom and French Delegations, and what we think might be done, along the lines you have in mind, to improve our position in the General Assembly's debate on disarmament and prepare for the work of the Disarmament Commission next year.

2. In our discussions with other delegations here, we have been using the somewhat abbreviated version of your memorandum of August 14 which we circulated to the United Kingdom, United States and French Delegations on September 5. It will therefore be more convenient for me to take this memorandum as the point of departure in reporting our talks. Copies of our memorandum of September 5† are attached, together with copies of my explanatory letter which was based on your letter No. D-585 of August 25 and the final paragraph of your memorandum of August 14.

Repeat to Washington as EX-1745.

French Comments

3. Shortly after receiving my letter of September 5 Mr. Francis Lacoste, the Deputy French Representative, had to return to Paris for consultations and we have therefore been discussing your ideas mainly with Mr. Tiné. The Quai d'Orsay are reluctant to go into details until Mr. Moch returns to Paris from the provinces at the end of this month. However, neither the French Delegation here nor the Quai d'Orsay seem to be in any doubt that Mr. Moch will welcome the initiative which we have taken. As Mr. Tiné says, it is not a very big step but, from Mr. Moch's point of view, a step in the right direction. When the French Government receive the report of their experts, Messrs. Perrin and Goldschmidt, on their discussions in Washington last week (Mr. Wrong's letter No. 2016 of September 16)† they will realize that anything further that Mr. Moch may wish to do in pursuing the ideas he has been advancing in the Disarmament Commission and privately in New York, would have to be put forward without any support from the United Kingdom and United States Governments. Mr. Arneson's parting words to Mr. Tiné in Washington were, "Don't let's try to do too much at this session of the Assembly."

4. We shall no doubt receive further comments from the French Delegation early in October, but I think we can take it that they are well disposed towards our new approach and may indeed wish to go somewhat further than we are suggesting.

United Kingdom and United States Comments

5. We have now had several conversations with members of the United Kingdom and United States Delegations whose views are sufficiently similar to be able to discuss them together. As I have said in my teletype under reference, their reaction is distinctly discouraging. They are glad we have been thinking about these matters seriously and hope that we will not drop our studies of the problem. At the same time they agree with our analysis of the dilemma in which the disarmament discussion in the General Assembly and subsequently in the Disarmament Commission will place the Western Powers, though they think our present position will be easier to defend than we fear. Their main disagreement with us is the idea of concentrating on a first slice of a comprehensive disarmament programme almost to the exclusion of the later stages and certainly before, as I understand it, general agreement on the later stages has been reached. Whether we foresee the possibility of putting the early stages of a disarmament programme into effect before the later stages have been worked out and agreed in detail, or whether we are thinking only of concentrating in our discussion on the first slice, both the United Kingdom and United States Delegations doubt whether this approach would improve our propaganda position or advance agreement.

6. In the first place, looking at our suggestion from the Soviet point of view, no amount of work on a first slice alone will overcome the fundamental Soviet objection that the West is only interested in collecting intelligence data and not in prohibiting weapons of mass destruction which we reserve for some final, and, they say, never-to-be-reached stage. They maintain — and Mr. Malik has re-emphasized this point in his latest statements in the Disarmament Commission — that, “without an immediate and unconditional prohibition of the atomic weapon and without the institution of strict international control of the observance of that prohibition, any talk about the reduction or limitation of armed forces and armaments would be hollow and fruitless.” (Disarmament Commission verbatim record of August 29.) By the same token, the U.S.S.R. would not be interested in discussing a comprehensive first slice, even including atomic control elements, until we had agreed to a prohibition of atomic weapons to come into effect simultaneously with the commencement of effective international control. The first slice would presumably include, under the present United States working paper on disclosure and verification, only an exchange of information on the least sensitive areas relating to atomic energy (an exterior examination of Hanford and Oak Ridge). A proposal to concentrate on a first slice would help to confirm Soviet suspicions that we never intended to go beyond it.

7. From the point of view of the United Kingdom and United States Governments, a first slice, taken by itself, would also be unacceptable. They would want to know the end of the process, beginning with the first slice, before they could agree to the initial stages. As Mr. Cohen told me sympathetically, he had also tried to discover some part of the whole, complex structure of a disarmament programme which could be separated and put into effect at once in order to develop the mutual confidence which would be necessary if the further steps in a comprehensive programme were to be agreed and put into operation. He had, however, been convinced by the Chiefs of Staff and others in Washington that it was impossible to isolate one part of the whole in this way. Although he had been thinking of a “vertical” slice (no doubt a separate plan for the reduction of armaments and armed forces), he thought the same difficulty would apply to our “horizontal” slice covering the first stage in time of the operation in a comprehensive programme. In order to attract the Soviets, he thought, we would have to go much further than his Government was prepared to go in present circumstances.

Comments on Detail

8. I should now like to mention more detailed comments made by U.S. and U.K. Delegations on the particular elements which our paper suggests should be included in the first slice (paragraph 5 in the Delegation memorandum and paragraph 14 in your memorandum).

a) Balanced reduction of armed forces: There was no disagreement with our suggestion that the tripartite proposal for the numerical limitation of armed forces might serve to cover this element of a first slice.

b) Balanced reduction of conventional armaments: Although it was agreed that the supplementary tripartite proposals were rather vague and thin on this point, neither the United States nor United Kingdom Governments are prepared to be more specific in developing this part of a comprehensive programme, even in its first stages, until there is more indication from the Soviet side that they are prepared to discuss the tripartite ceiling proposals seriously. Mr. Cohen has told us that the chief reason for the reticence of his Government on this score is the obvious difficulty in reaching agreement among the armed services as to the respective shares each would have of the forces and armaments to remain under permitted ceilings.

c) Revision of initial steps in the atomic energy control plan: This element is, as you know, being re-examined by the United States Panel of Consultants, the Inter-Departmental Committee of officials in London, and, we understand, a corresponding body which is being constituted in Paris. No one will have concrete ideas ready in time for the Assembly and the United Kingdom and United States Delegations are reluctant even to suggest during the Assembly that the majority plan may be revised, although they are willing to say that the whole problem of correlating elements in a disarmament programme is being examined by experts. We gather from the United Kingdom Delegation that the Oppenheimer Panel of Consultants has so far done very little and is not likely to produce a serious, detailed study comparable to the Acheson-Lilienthal Report. In view of all the circumstances, domestic and international, which have, I think, been well developed in Mr. Ignatieff's memorandum enclosed with Mr. Wrong's letter No. 1956 of September 4,† it would not be realistic for us to expect support from either the United Kingdom or United States Governments in developing this item unless there were a major break in the international situation.

d) Disclosure and verification: Although the United States Mission would, of course, be happy to see their working paper on this subject accepted as covering the first stage requirements, the United Kingdom Government, and no doubt others including the French, would have serious reservations, particularly on such aspects as the insistence on almost unrestricted aerial surveys in the first stage. I should imagine it was not consistent with our principle of a balance of risks and safeguards on both sides to ask the Soviet Union to accept aerial surveys in exchange for the opportunity to look at Oak Ridge and Hanford from the outside; and yet that is virtually what the first stage of the United States proposals on disclosure and verification call for in regard to atomic energy.

e) International control organ: I think there is general agreement that this is one of the elements which the Disarmament Commission should examine next year. Certainly the French Delegation hope that, in the early stages at least, it might, upon examination, prove possible to achieve an adequate degree of control over atomic and other aspects of the programme through "inspection only". In this way it would be unnecessary to raise the issue of ownership until the later stages, if at all.

Our next step

9. Although, as you can see, a certain amount of cold water has been poured upon our proposals by the United Kingdom and United States Delegations, I do not regard the effort put into developing our proposals as wasted and I am sure that neither the United Kingdom nor the United States Delegations would wish to discourage us from pursuing our serious and more detailed studies of this subject. I suggest that there are two conclusions from our talks here:

a) no detailed proposals can be developed in time for this session of the General Assembly;

b) it is highly desirable, both from the point of view of strengthening our position in the propaganda field and from the point of view of keeping open the door for serious negotiations, that we continue to stress the need for developing a comprehensive disarmament programme.

10. I think we shall have achieved something constructive for the disarmament debate during the General Assembly and for the work of the Disarmament Commission next year if we succeed in having included in the resolution presented to the General Assembly a direction to the Disarmament Commission to develop a comprehensive programme, i.e. to fill in the gaps in this year's work. This may not be as easy as it would at first appear, as I understand from Mr. Cohen that there is some reluctance in Washington to going even this far. I am reasonably sure that the United Kingdom Government would agree as, of course, would the French Government.

11. Since you have asked for my own comments as well, I think that we should not drop our idea of concentrating the work of the Disarmament Commission on a first slice, but should expand that idea along the lines of paragraph 7 in our memorandum and paragraph 16 in your memorandum. It is quite clear that unless the Soviet Government change their position radically, they will insist on some kind of "decision" being taken concerning the prohibition of weapons of mass destruction before they agree to any kind of international control or inspection or disclosure. Could not the general statement of objectives, to which you refer in this paragraph be developed in the form of a preamble to a draft agreement which would necessarily go into greater detail on the first slice than on subsequent stages? This proposal would, in fact, amount to an attempt to take the Soviet formula — which is so far nothing more than a formula — and put Western content into it. The deadlock in the Disarmament Commission during the past year has arisen because Mr. Malik has been insisting on what he calls a "decision" and refusing to discuss the detailed content on how such a decision would be implemented, while Western representatives have consistently shied away from any kind of a "decision" until the "how" had been agreed in detail. Surely it should not be completely impossible to combine these so far irreconcilable approaches to the problem, at an auspicious time.

Timing

12. The rub, as always, is when to take a new initiative, when to offer some concessions. Until there is a truce in Korea, there seems very little point in trying to develop a new approach or new concessions. But on the assumption that there may be a truce at any time or some other break which would favour the presentation of new proposals, we should, I believe, continue in the closest consultations with our friends to try to work out the details of a new approach of some kind. In this process, I hope that Canadian thinking will play some part.

2. Mr. Wershof. It is expected that the Disarmament Commission will this week adopt its report to the forthcoming session of the General Assembly. This report, which will be in greater detail than the interim report which was submitted on June 1, will contain a comprehensive summary of the work of the Commission since its establishment by the Assembly last January. It will not attempt to draw any conclusions or to make recommendations since no agreement was reached on any of the substantive matters discussed. It will, however, bring out fairly clearly the particularly negative and obstructive attitude of the Soviet Delegation. Our Delegation in New York has been instructed to support its adoption. The present intention of the Western Powers is not to make any effort to dramatize the disarmament debate in the Assembly but merely to use the Commission's report to demonstrate the contrasting attitudes of the Western and Soviet Delegations. A simple resolution may then be introduced instructing the Commission to continue its efforts to develop a comprehensive disarmament programme.<sup>103</sup>

DISARMAMENT DEBATE IN THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Following from the Under-Secretary, Begins: I thought that it might be useful to prepare for the Minister a memorandum summarizing our thoughts on how the subject of disarmament might be treated at the Assembly in the context of East-West relations. However, this memorandum was not ready in time to hand to the Minister before his departure and I am therefore sending it in my immediately following teletype. Ends.

DISARMAMENT DEBATE IN THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Reference: My immediately preceding teletype.

Following is text of memorandum for the Minister, Begins: It is the view of the Western Delegations on the Disarmament Commission, as reported by our Delegation in New York, that no attempt should be made to dramatize or enlarge the scope of the disarmament debate this year. With this I think we would agree. There would be a real danger, in any attempt by the Western Powers to launch a propaganda offensive on the disarmament issue, that the debate might reveal during its course the fundamental dilemma with which Western policy is faced on this question.

2. As you well know, the view is held in some quarters that the maintenance by the Western Powers of their present overwhelming superiority in atomic weapons and their ability to apply those weapons swiftly and accurately constitute the main deterrent to Soviet aggression and the main hope for containing such aggression, if it should occur. A logical corollary of this view is that the Western Powers should do nothing to restrict either the use of the atomic weapon itself, if the need arises, or the threat of its use, and that they should indeed make clear to the Soviet Government their ability to render prohibitive the cost to the Soviet Union of any outbreak of general war. At the same time, however, little or no effort has been made to acquaint public opinion in the democratic countries with this approach to the disarmament problem. On the contrary, the Western Powers have attempted to meet the widespread public sentiment in favour of disarmament, and particularly of the prohibition and elimination of weapons of mass destruction, by committing themselves to consideration of a comprehensive disarmament plan. Thus, while on the one hand they have become increasingly dependent on the atomic weapon for the preservation of their security against further Soviet expansion, the Western Powers face on the other hand loss of the propaganda initiative unless they are ready to fill in the whole disarmament plan with specific and concrete proposals.

3. It is most desirable that this dilemma should be concealed from the Assembly. If, however, the Soviet Union attempts to link the disarmament issue with the theme of "peaceful co-existence" in a general propaganda offensive, we are, I think, in a position to make an effective reply. I would therefore suggest that, as a matter of tactics, we should not raise the disarmament question in our speech during the general debate but should wait until we can see what line the Soviet representative in the Political Committee intends to take on the disarmament item. If he attempts to enlarge the debate on that item, our reply should then be aimed primarily at exposing the intransigence of the position so far taken by the Soviet Union on disarmament, while at the same time making clear our readiness to examine any reasonable proposals that are made. It should also emphasize that the continued refusal of the Soviet representative in the Disarmament Commission to discuss seriously the proposals so far submitted by the Western Powers may jeopardize the further development of these proposals into a comprehensive disarmament plan.

4. The record of the Disarmament Commission can be used to good effect in pointing the contrast between the Soviet and Western attitudes to date, without entering into a sterile discussion on the details of the proposal already submitted to the Commission. When it commenced its substantive work, the Commission had before it certain principles which the Sixth Session of the Assembly had drawn up for its guidance and which were based on the disarmament resolution submitted to that session by France, the United Kingdom and the United States. It also had referred to it the Soviet counter-proposals, which contained such phrases as "a decision proclaiming the unconditional prohibition of atomic weapons", "strict international control", "complete official data on armaments and armed forces", etc. So far the Western Powers have submitted to the Commission six working papers designed to elaborate in some detail their concept of how the Assembly's principles should be implemented. The Soviet Delegation, on the other hand, has tabled no such working papers and has stubbornly refused to reply to detailed questions concerning the original Soviet proposals until there is "agreement on principles" (i.e., until the Commission first takes a "decision" on the unconditional prohibition of atomic weapons). At the meeting on April 4 of Committee 1 of the Commission, the Canadian representative asked again the questions which Mr. Vishinsky had left unanswered when they were put by the leader of the Canadian Delegation on January 16, 1952, in the First Committee of the Assembly. The Soviet representative, Mr. Malik, brushed these questions aside with the suggestion that the flood of identical questions concerning the Soviet proposals indicated a conspiracy among the questioners to avoid discussion of the substance of those proposals.

5. Moreover, the Soviet Delegation has missed no opportunity to inject blatant propaganda into the Commission's deliberations. He has tried repeatedly to distract the Commission from its proper functions by raising charges of the use of bacteriological warfare by United Nations forces in Korea.

6. The Soviet representative has also declined either to discuss seriously the substantive proposals so far put forward by the Western Powers or to submit amendments or alternative proposals. His only excuse for this behaviour has been his repeated claim that the essence of the Western proposals is the disclosure by other states of information on armaments and armed forces and the concealment by the Western Powers of information on the atomic bomb and secret weapons. Not only is this untrue (the United States working paper on disclosure and verification applies to both atomic and non-atomic information) but the Soviet representative himself has ignored every invitation to submit details of a more acceptable plan. If the Soviet Union did not consider that the Western proposals contained a balance of risks and safeguards as between the disclosure of atomic and non-atomic information, it was open to the Soviet Union to produce proposals that would. What the Soviet Union could hardly deny was that prohibition and reduction could not be enforced unless there was verified information on what was being prohibited and reduced.

7. In these circumstances, refusal by the Soviet Union to discuss the detailed problems of disclosure and verification and Soviet insistence on the undefined principle of "non-interference in the domestic affairs of states" can only be interpreted as unwillingness to co-operate in establishing an open and substantially disarmed world, and this attitude might be related, as part of the pattern of all-pervasive totalitarian state control, with the Soviet refusal to allow any freedom of movement whatever either across its borders or within them. In this way the Soviet attitude on disarmament could be linked with Stalin's pronouncements concerning the division of the world into hostile camps. Because the dialectical interpretation of current international affairs sees the world in terms of a permanent irreconcilable division between the Communist and non-Communist states, the Soviet Government is apparently not prepared to embark seriously on the kind of co-operative effort which a comprehensive and effective disarmament programme would entail.

8. In taking such a line we should, I think, be careful to avoid the danger of exposing ourselves to similar criticism by giving the impression that we are not prepared to make any further efforts in developing a comprehensive disarmament plan unless the Soviet Union changes its attitude. The temptation to do this will be great in view of the dilemma which I have described above. The longer the Soviet Union maintains its intransigent attitude the more willing the United States and the United Kingdom become to retreat from their original position of being in favour of the prohibition of the atomic bomb. This tendency seems to me to be both unreasonable and dangerous. I cannot for my own part see any objection to our stating plainly that our objective is the same as what the Soviet Union claims is its objective, namely, the prohibition and elimination of atomic weapons and weapons of mass destruction and the reduction of armaments and armed forces, but that, whereas we are prepared to discuss seriously and in detail how we might arrive at that objective, the Soviet Union has so far refused to do so. There may be valid objections to making such a statement at this juncture. However, I think the least we can do is to make clear our determination to push ahead with our efforts to develop the proposals already put forward into a comprehensive disarmament plan on the basis of the principles drawn up by the previous Assembly. We could in addition emphasize that, if the Soviet Union does not desire the development of such a disarmament plan, the most effective way to hinder its development is to convince the Western Powers that it will continue to treat all their proposals with the same contempt they have so far received. Message ends.

 2. The Committee considered a draft JPC report to the Chiefs of Staff Committee prepared by the JPS as requested. This report recommended that consideration be given to the creation of an interdepartmental Committee and a Joint Working Party to provide Canadian views on disarmament matters.

3. The A/Chairman<sup>104</sup> felt that before establishment of special machinery for handling disarmament matters was made the subject of recommendations, the principle that Canada should undertake an extensive part in the work of the Disarmament Commission should be established as Government policy. This was not a matter for JPC comment or recommendation. He noted that establishment of such an organization as was indicated in the draft report under consideration was a serious matter for the Services since, owing to recent expansion, it was becoming increasingly difficult to provide trained and experienced officers to meet all needs. It appears that the first thing to establish was the importance of more extensive Canadian participation in the work of the Disarmament Commission as compared with current activities of the Services. The degree of effort that should be put forth in the Services to assist in disarmament studies could then be assessed in the light of approved Government policy and External Affairs could then make recommendations as to what machinery was needed.

3. The External Affairs representative remarked that Canada was the only permanent member of the Disarmament Commission besides the permanent members of the Security Council and that it was Canadian policy to carry a fair share of the work. His department now felt that Canada should do more than in the past and for this reason military advice had been sought for the formulation of Canadian views on disarmament questions. Through the JPC, Chiefs of Staff views had been received on two previous occasions. However, when military views had been sought on a new approach to the disarmament problem which was being formulated by External Affairs, it had been the JPC view that the production of military views on that paper would be beyond the capacity of the present JPS not only because of the amount of continuous work involved, but also because of other tasks now being done by the JPS. As a result the report now before the Committee had been prepared with a view to providing an adequate organization for dealing with problems as they arose. The External Affairs representative observed that his department was not by any means bound to follow through with the approach which had occasioned the present concern over the amount of work involved, but he felt that there was a definite need for adequate consideration to be given to all phases of the work of the Disarmament Commission, including the plans put forward by other nations, and this required military advice. He appreciated the personnel problems but felt that the tasks would not require a full time working group.

4. The A/Chairman observed that the report under review was not clear as to whether the working party was to be a full time organization. In any event he felt that initially it would have to operate on a full-time basis for a considerable period. Should it develop that the military staff required augmentation to do the work, the fact that the vacancies for a second JPS team might be filled to meet the need should be considered.

5. The Air Force member [Group Captain Coleman] stated that it was his understanding that the organization proposed in the JPC report was being considered so that the new approach recently put forward by External Affairs could be studied with a view to making a detailed and extensive military contribution to the scheme. However, if that was not now the immediate concern, it would perhaps be preferable for External Affairs to put forward the implications of increased participation in the work of the Disarmament Commission and obtain a decision as to what scale of effort should be devoted to this work.

6. The Committee, after a further exchange of views, agreed that the Secretary should draft a reply to the letter of the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs dated 9 Aug 52.+ This letter should point out that to produce comments of value an appropriate military staff would have to work full time for at least a considerable period. Although the UK and the US have formidable machinery for dealing with disarmament matters, such is not the case with Canada, and the present Service organizations are not adequate to undertake tasks additional to present commitments. Owing to the recent expansion of the Services, it has become increasingly difficult to produce staff officers with the training and experience necessary for the type of tasks under consideration, without serious implications for current service commitments. It is therefore suggested that these implications be brought to the attention of the Government and that in their light a decision be sought as to the importance of the disarmament studies proposed in relation to our existing military commitments. Then, if the Government so directs, the creation of an adequate organization could be investigated.

6. The Secretary reported that a memorandum from the Secretary Chiefs of Staff Committee had been received as follows:

"The Chairman, Chiefs of Staff does not consider that it would be appropriate to forward the draft letter attached to your memorandum of 23 October, 1952 to the Department of External Affairs.† He has directed that the Joint Planning Committee prepare a report outlining the requests concerning disarmament proposals which have been received from the Department of External Affairs and also containing recommendations as to the manner in which military advice on this subject should be provided.

Your report should include consideration as to the type of machinery which should be established and to the means of providing any personnel which are required. It would be well to include consideration as to whether personnel need be full or part-time."

The Vice Chiefs of Staff Committee are being asked to discuss your report and to make recommendations for Chiefs of Staff consideration as to how this matter should be handled.

It is requested that the Joint Planning Committee prepare a report along the lines outlined above."<sup>105</sup>

7. The Committee after further discussion agreed that the JPS be directed to prepare a report for the Vice Chiefs of Staff<sup>106</sup> taking into consideration the views expressed by the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff, and that the Committee further agreed the report should emphasize the necessity of the proposed working party being a separate entity from the Joint Planning Staff, and that such working party should be afforded the necessary arrangements for liaison with appropriate Service Directorates, to keep them informed of current military plans.

II—U.N. DISARMAMENT COMMISSION, CANADIAN MILITARY VIEWS ON REDUCTION OF ARMED FORCES AND ARMAMENTS

2. The Committee had for consideration a report prepared by the Joint Planning Committee in the light of a memorandum submitted to the Chiefs of Staff by the Department of External Affairs, requesting military views on a suggested new approach for the UN Disarmament Commission.

The Joint Planning Committee report recommended that:

(a) if it were decided that Canada should take a more active role in the UN Disarmament Commission, inter-departmental machinery should be set up to provide adequate guidance for the Canadian Delegate, and suggested in Appendix "C" of the report, interim machinery for the formulation of Canada's disarmament policy;

(b) until such time as a proper organization has been established to handle the disarmament problem, no attempts should be made to give military views on the proposal put forward by the Department of External Affairs.

(CSC 1644-1 (VCS) of 14 Nov 52)

3. The Acting Vice Chief of the General Staff said that before approving the establishment of machinery to handle disarmament problems, it was considered necessary to obtain the views of the Chiefs of Staff as to the extent to which Canada should participate in disarmament matters. The Services were concentrating on a build-up of forces, and Canada's active participation could have a popular appeal throughout the country which would possibly affect adversely the build-up program of the Services.

this will be ready for JPC's next meeting (Nov. 4). J.M. C[ook]

4. The Coordinator, Joint Staff, said that the Department of External Affairs had referred several problems to the Services during the past year for military views. These problems had been dealt with by the Joint Planning Committee on an ad hoc basis. Although existing staffs were adequate to deal with disarmament problems, it was desirable to allocate the responsibility to a particular group who were in the position to devote their full time for a limited period. Moreover, having all disarmament problems dealt with by the same group should ensure continuity of thought on these problems.

5. The Representative of the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs said that it was the view of his Department that inasmuch as Canada was a member of the Disarmament Commission, she should be prepared to play her full part. Not only should Canada put forward new ideas, but she should be in a position to make sure that suggestions put forward by others were technically sound. It was fully appreciated that there was little prospect of any increased Canadian participation accomplishing much, but there was great propaganda value in active Canadian participation.

Past problems on disarmament which had been forwarded for military views had been dealt with adequately, and although the Department of External Affairs' suggested new approach to the disarmament problem would entail a great deal of work, it was felt that the present machinery was adequate to deal with it.

6. Brigadier Gibson said that if the Chiefs of Staff agreed to give wholeheartedly to Canada's participation in the affairs of the Disarmament Commission, it was important that Service representatives on an inter-departmental committee be fully conversant with Service programs and activities. Therefore, the suggestion that the Service representation be at the Colonel level was of doubtful value, as they would be required to clear their views with higher authority prior to putting them forward in an inter-departmental committee.

7. Commodore Rayner suggested that the Service Members of the Joint Planning Committee represent the Services on the inter-departmental committee. A second team to the Joint Planning Staff was in the process of being formed; this team could form the military working party on disarmament.

8. The Vice Chief of the Air Staff said that Canada's active participation in disarmament problems required careful consideration and agreed that the Chiefs of Staff should express their views as to whether Canada should participate in disarmament problems and indicate the extent of this participation. The Joint Planning Committee should be asked to prepare a paper for the Chiefs of Staff pointing out the implications of Canada's participation in disarmament problems and making recommendations as to the extent Canada should participate. This paper should deal with the broad aspects of the problem and should not refer to the Department of External Affairs' proposal, or go into the detail of machinery to effect military participation.

9. It was agreed after further discussion:

(a) that the Joint Planning Committee would report to the Chiefs of Staff Committee<sup>107</sup> on the implications to the armed services of Canada's participation in disarmament problems and recommend the extent to which Canada should participate;

(b) that if the Chiefs of Staff Committee approve of Canada's full active participation in the affairs of the Disarmament Commission, an inter-departmental committee reporting to the Cabinet Defence Committee should be formed. Service representation on this committee should be drawn from the Service Members of the Joint Planning Committee or their representatives. The Joint Planning Staff should furnish the Service Representatives on the working level.

In the light of this report if it is considered that special machinery to deal with disarmament problems is required, the Vice Chiefs of Staff agreed that an interdepartmental committee reporting to the Cabinet Defence Committee should be formed. [Ottawa,] December 26, 1952

The Joint Planning Committee discussed the item on the United Nations Disarmament Commission on the basis of the Vice Chiefs minutes as amended. Both the discussion and the conclusion were confusing. It is obvious that the Service people would like to keep away from this subject, emphasizing its complexity and the time that would be involved in studying it. I explained that if the Department of National Defence wished to express the view that it could give no military advice, we would be glad to have that answer at the earliest possible date. It appears, however, that this simple answer does not appeal to them. The question has been referred to the JPS without any definite guidance except that they are to assess the advantages and disadvantages from a military point of view. Commodore Rayner spoke to me after this futile conversation and expressed the view that it was necessary to set up an ad hoc committee and that until this was done it was quite impossible to know what might be required or what the Services could produce. This is the only sensible statement made so far and I hope that the matter can be worked out that way.

Mr. John Blandford, Director of the Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees. The plan envisages the expenditure of $50,000,000 for relief and $200,000,000 for re-integration, over and above such contributions as may be made by local governments, and is to be carried out over a period of approximately three years starting as of July 1, 1951. UNRWA is to explore with the Arab Governments concerned the desirability and practicability of transferring the administration of relief to these Governments at the earliest possible date. The Arab Governments gave their support to the plan on humanitarian grounds and because it did not prejudice the right of refugees to ultimate repatriation and compensation. The resolution was adopted by 47 votes in favour, 0 against and 7 abstentions (Burma, Byelo-Russia, Chile, Czechoslovakia, Poland, the Ukraine and the U.S.S.R.). While supporting the resolution, the Canadian Delegation specifically reserved the Canadian position on the financial aspects of the plan.

CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO UNRWAPR

Mr. Scott and I discussed this afternoon the letter of January 28, 1952 from the Chairman of the Negotiating Committee for extra-budgetary funds requesting the Canadian Government to be prepared to pledge a contribution to the agency for the year 1951-52 when the committee re-convenes in New York in mid-February. The following conclusions were reached:

- (a) It would be desirable that Canada make some contribution;
- (b) A well documented memorandum in justification of a Canadian contribution will have to be submitted to the Department of Finance;
- (c) In preparing this memorandum the views of the European Division on the political aspects of the matter, and of the Economic Division on the economic aspects of the relief and rehabilitation plan to be carried out by the agency in the course of the next three years, should be sought;
- (d) Consideration should be given to the possibility of using the formula suggested some time ago by Mr. Reid for a small token Canadian contribution which would be increased in a given proportion according to amounts pledged by other countries in a political and geographical position vis-à-vis the Near East comparable to Canada's.

2. Mr. Scott then telephoned Mr. Reid to obtain guidance on the timing and procedure for this operation. Mr. Reid agreed with the above. He thought, however, that we should wait until the Minister returns to Ottawa towards the end of this month before making a submission to the Cabinet. In the meantime, we should do all the preparatory work and consult with Finance on the official level once the departmental position has been established. We might also keep our representative on the Negotiating Committee informed of official thinking so as to facilitate his work.

3. Mr. Hardy telephoned Mr. Hemsley to find out the proper time and place for inclusion of an amount in the estimates in the event that a decision is reached that Canada should make a contribution. Mr. Hemsley said that if such a decision were reached some time in March the contribution could be included in the final supplementary estimates for the Canadian fiscal year 1951-52, which are submitted to Parliament before March 31, as the programme would cover the agency's fiscal year, July 1, 1951 to June 30, 1952<sup>111</sup>

CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO UNITED NATIONS RELIEF AND WORKS AGENCY FOR PALESTINE REFUGEES, 1951-52

In a letter of January 28, 1952,† a copy of which is attached, the Acting Chairman of the Negotiating Committee for Extra-Budgetary Funds requested the Canadian government to give consideration to a Canadian contribution to UNRWAPR for the year ending June 30, 1952 and to have a Canadian representative prepared to discuss this matter when the Negotiating Committee reconvenes in New York. After a session held in Paris, the Committee resumed its meetings in New York on March 4, 1952.

2. I attach, for your consideration, a draft of a memorandum<sup>112</sup> on this subject, which my Minister has approved, and which he may wish to submit to

Mr. Hardy: Good. I confirmed this with Mr. Reid in conversation today.

In regard to 1(d) it is for consideration whether this contribution sh[oul]d be "in a given (i.e. stated) proportion" or be more generally and vaguely related to other contributions.

Mr. Reid thought we had not "missed the boat" before the Minister's departure — the time w[oul]d not then have been propitious to approach Cabinet.

Will you (1) go ahead as you have outlined (2) tell the delegation in N[ew] Y[ork] within a few days what we have in mind, explaining why we cannot let them have anything definite for the delegation before the first meeting of the Neg[otiating] Comm[ittee]. the Cabinet this week on his return from Washington. This memorandum recommends that the Canadian representative on the Negotiating Committee be authorized to announce that Canada will make a contribution to the Agency of $750,000 for the year July 1, 1951 to June 30, 1952, subject to approval by the Canadian Parliament. It also recommends that the Canadian representative should explicitly reserve the Canadian position with regard to contributions for the following two years, as the programme approved by the Assembly is for a three-year period.

3. Of the $77,000,000 required to finance the programme of the Agency for the year ending June 30, 1952, $27,000,000 or approximately 35%, is to be spent on direct relief and $50,000,000 or approximately 65%, to be used for rehabilitation projects. In view of the importance of rehabilitation projects as a means to a lasting solution of the refugee problem, it might be desirable to indicate that our contribution is to be allocated between relief and rehabilitation in roughly the above proportions, and to amend paragraph 9 (a) of the proposed memorandum to the Cabinet accordingly. It might be stated, for example, that $250,000, or a higher amount is to be earmarked for relief and the remainder for rehabilitation. It might be desirable to consider whether a proportion of the Canadian contribution, either for relief or rehabilitation, be specified as being in kind.

4. If Cabinet agrees that a Canadian contribution is to be made for the year ending June 30, 1952, it will, I understand, be necessary to include the contribution in the final Supplementary Estimates for 1951-52, since inclusion in the 1952-53 estimates would probably not permit full payment to the Agency before June 30, 1952, the closing day of its fiscal year. Pending final action by the Cabinet, I have thought it in order to provide for a Canadian contribution to UNRWAPR on a provisional basis in this Department's 1951-52 final Supplementary Estimates which were submitted to the Treasury Board Division of your Department last Friday, March 7. If its is not possible to secure Cabinet approval by the end of this week, the item will, of course, have to be deleted.

[Ottawa,] March 4 (??), 1952

ASSISTANCE TO PALESTINE REFUGEES

Since the end of 1948 some 900,000 refugees, who have lost their homes and livelihood as a result of hostilities in Palestine, have existed principally on relief provided by the United Nations, supplemented by private contributions from all over the world. Because of its central role in creating the state of Israel, the United Nations has recognized in a number of resolutions its responsibility for the refugee problem and has consistently endeavoured to find a satisfactory solution to it.

2. Accordingly, in January of this year, the General Assembly accepted, by a vote of 49-0 (the Soviet bloc abstaining) the "Blandford Plan" for the relief and rehabilitation of Palestine refugees. It calls for the expenditure, over a three-year period, of $50,000,000 (U.S.) for relief on a diminishing scale and $200,000,000 (U.S.) for the re-integration of the refugees into the life of countries surrounding Palestine. Of this total, $77,000,000 is the estimated requirement for the first year ending June 30, 1952, and $118,000,000 and $55,000,000 respectively for the following two years. Acceptance of the plan is without prejudice to the right of refugees to ultimate repatriation or to compensation, whenever a political settlement between the Arab states and Israel makes this possible.

3. The Blandford Plan has been carefully studied by those most competent to advise, and appears to be as good a one as can be framed within the terms of practical politics in that disturbed region. It stands a very fair chance of success, provided that two conditions are met: first, that adequate funds are contributed by states outside the area; secondly, that the governments of these Middle Eastern states honestly try to carry it out.

4. The first of these requisites is already reasonably close to fulfilment so far as the first year is concerned. Towards $77,000,000 required, $67,000,000 have already been pledged as follows: United States — $50,000,000 (These powers have United Kingdom — 12,400,000 immediate strategic and France — 2,571,400 economic interests in the area.) Egypt — 391,000 Jordan — 168,000 New Zealand — 210,000 19 other countries — 775,000 In addition, Australia, the Netherlands and Brazil have indicated an intention to contribute. The Australian contribution, according to available information, will be about $600,000 in goods and services.

5. Satisfaction of the second requirement for the success of the plan — full and honest co-operation of the countries in the area — is less assured. It has been argued that for political reasons the Arab states will not assist in the permanent settlement of refugees from Israel in Arab territory. On the other hand, it has been argued that while the Arab states cannot admit that they will participate in such work, they will in practice do so. At best, the Blandford Plan should lead to a very considerable improvement in the lot of the refugees and in the stability of the Middle East. At worst, a proportion, though by no means all, of the funds involved may be dissipated without lasting results. In the opinion of the undersigned, the chance of success is sufficiently good that, in view of the considerations outlined below, the risk should be taken.

6. The reasons for Canadian financial participation in the Plan are as follows:

(a) the United Nations has an admitted responsibility for the welfare of these refugees.

(c) resettlement of the refugees will remove, or reduce, one group of Asians particularly susceptible to Communist and Russian propaganda;

(d) assistance to that area will be consistent with our policy of drawing Asian states towards the Western and democratic world, rather than allowing them to drift into the Communist camp;

(e) the security of the Near East is vital to the security of the North Atlantic region and it is therefore a matter of general importance and concern. The continuing tension between Israel and the Arab states, aggravated and perpetuated by the refugee problem, is one of the basic threats to Middle East security. The plan, so far as it is successful, will help to reduce the friction existing in that region;

(f) a reasonable Canadian contribution, offered in the circumstances outlined below, should encourage other comparable states to match our contribution;

(g) the obvious humanitarian reasons.

7. Negotiations with governments, members and non-members of the United Nations, regarding contributions are being carried out by a special Negotiating Committee established by the General Assembly. The Committee, after a session held in Paris in January, resumed its meetings in New York on March 4, 1952 to discuss with representatives of governments which have not yet made their position known, the contributions which they may wish to offer.

8. In recognition of their special interest in the Near East, the United States, the United Kingdom and France among them have pledged close to $65,000,000 or more than 84% of the total of $77,000,000 for the first year. If the remaining $12,000,000 were to be assessed among all other United Nations members according to the scale of contributions to the regular budget of the United Nations, Canada's share would be almost $900,000. Because contributions may also be made by non-members of the United Nations and private organizations, it is considered that an amount of $750,000, or a little less than 1% of the total, would represent a reasonable Canadian contribution and realistically reflect Canadian responsibility in the refugee problem and political interest in the preservation of stability in a strategically important area. This compares with a Canadian contribution of $1,040,616 (U.S.) or 2.9% of the total received for the period December 1, 1948 to April 30, 1950 and of $1,400,313 (U.S.) or 3.1% for the period May 1, 1950 to June 30, 1951.

9. It is therefore recommended that:

(a) the Canadian Representative be authorized to announce before the Negotiating Committee that Canada will make a contribution to the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees of $750,000 for the year July 1, 1951 to June 30, 1952, subject to approval by the Canadian Parliament;

(b) the Canadian Representative explicitly reserve the Canadian position with regard to contributions to the programme for the following two years, and state that a Canadian decision to make such further contributions will largely depend on the success of the plan during the first year, on evidence that local governments in the area are co-operating with the Agency in the administration of relief and re-integration projects, and on the willingness shown by countries in a position comparable to Canada's to share the financial burden;

(c) that an amount of $750,000 be included in the final Supplementary Estimates for the fiscal year 1951-52 to provide for the Canadian contribution.

Ottawa, March 14, 1952

Attention: E. Reid, Esq.

Dear Sir,

CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO THE UNITED NATIONS RELIEF
AND WORKS AGENCY FOR PALESTINE REFUGEES, 1951-1952

I have your letter of March 10th enclosing a draft Memorandum to Cabinet<sup>113</sup> recommending a contribution of $750,000 toward the 1951-52 programme of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East.

As you know, we in this Department have been disappointed with the results achieved by past attempts to solve the refugee problem and have expressed serious misgivings about further financial contributions to Agency programmes. In particular we have stressed the need for Arab co-operation and adequate and equitable financial support — the “conditions for a lasting solution” referred to in paragraph 3 of your draft memorandum.

Whether these “conditions” have been adequately fulfilled and whether recent developments in the Middle East warrant a further Canadian contribution is, of course, a matter for Cabinet decision. However, without anticipating that decision you may wish to take into account the following observations and suggestions which might be helpful in meeting some of our past reservations and in making your proposals more acceptable on purely financial grounds.

In your draft you state that the condition of adequate financial support is reasonably close to fulfilment, and express the belief that a contribution of a little less than 1% of the total requirement would realistically reflect Canadian responsibility in the refugee problem and our political interest in the preservation of stability in this strategically important area.

It is true that $67 million of the $77 million required for the first year has already been pledged, and that a contribution of $750,000 compares favourably with the Canadian assessment to the United Nations itself. Nevertheless, I feel that we cannot overlook the fact that virtually the whole of the pledged amounts will be provided by the United States, United Kingdom and France, whose interests in the area are readily demonstrable and so much more direct than our own. It is my feeling that the record of many other governments is still far from satisfactory and that, if we are to participate, we should not hesitate to insist on a more equitable sharing of the burdens.

There are many ways in which our position on this matter could be made explicit, including the establishment of a direct relationship between the final amount of any Canadian contribution and the share of the residue to be assumed by others with comparable responsibilities and interests.<sup>114</sup> This might take the form of a "matching" formula along the lines of that announced by our delegation at the recent Technical Assistance Conference.

On the further question of Arab co-operation, I am disturbed that it has not been possible to obtain public assurances of a kind that would normally be required if financial considerations were the final test of Canadian participation. However, I appreciate the difficult political circumstances that surround the resettlement of Arab refugees outside Israel and understand that it is the particular merit of the Blandford plan that it has been designed to circumvent these difficulties. I note, however, that you believe that the chances of success are sufficiently great to warrant acceptance of the risks implicit in the direction of large amounts in this area. In view of the uncertainties, I feel that, if we participate, we would be fully justified in announcing conditions and safeguards intended to give expression to the many doubts we still maintain. By controlling the rate of releases we could serve notice that our continuing co-operation is contingent upon the development and maintenance of conditions and standards of performance that will contribute to the attainment of the ultimate objective. You have already suggested that the Canadian Representative should explicitly reserve the Canadian position with regard to contributions for the second and third years of the proposed programme. If we participate, I believe that we should go further and indicate our intention of maintaining direct control over any Canadian contribution during the first trial period.

If Cabinet approves a Canadian contribution, I would recommend that these conditions should be announced in the Negotiating Committee at the time we make our pledge. The Canadian Representative might state that in view of current uncertainties the final rate and nature of releases of any Canadian contribution which may be approved by Parliament will be subject to agreement between the Canadian Government and the Secretary-General.<sup>115</sup> In this way, we would, in effect, serve notice that the programme will be under constant surveillance and that the extent of Canadian support will be directly influenced by evidence of progress toward the plan's main goals. This method of control would also obviate the necessity for announcing in advance the exact ratio to be maintained between expenditures for direct relief and rehabilitation.

1.

In paragraph 3 of your letter accompanying the Cabinet memorandum, you have suggested that the Canadian contribution might be allocated between relief and rehabilitation on the basis of 35% for relief and 65% for rehabilitation. I believe that the same results could be achieved if our Representative stated that the actual allocation between relief and rehabilitation would be taken directly into account in determining the rate of releases.<sup>116</sup> This more flexible approach would avoid the necessity for drawing undue attention to the delicate question of "resettlement" at this time.

You have also recommended that a portion of the Canadian contribution should be provided in kind. This might also be subject to agreement between the Secretary-General and the Canadian Government. In this way we would retain the right to utilise all or part of any Canadian contribution for the purchase of commodities that might become surplus in Canada during the year without requiring advance announcement of any arbitrary final division.

I have also considered your suggestion that provision of any Canadian contribution should be made in the 1951-52 supplementaries. After discussion within the Department, we have come to the conclusion that, if a contribution is to be made, it would be preferable to make the necessary provision in the supplementary estimates for 1952-53. As you know, it is too late to make provision in the main 1952-53 estimates, and any amount included in the 1951-52 supplementaries would have to be paid by March 31st, thereby denying the possibility of maintaining the desired measure of control. Inclusion in the 1952-53 supplementaries, which are brought down in June, would permit continuing control over the rate of releases.

Yours very truly,

W.C. CLARK

PRINCIPLES DETERMINING VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTIONS TO UNITED NATIONS AGENCIES

ASSISTANCE TO PALESTINE REFUGEES

The immediate purpose of this memorandum is to seek a decision regarding our contribution to the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees for the year July 1, 1951 to June 30, 1952. A less immediate but more important purpose is to examine the principles which should guide us in determining voluntary contributions to United Nations agencies.

2. You will recall that on March 10, 1952 we placed before the Department of Finance a recommendation, which had been approved by the Minister, for a Canadian contribution of $750,000 to UNRWAPR. We considered that this amount would realistically reflect Canada's relative responsibility in the refugee problem and political interest in the preservation of stability in this strategically important area.

3. In his letter of March 14, 1952, attached, the Deputy Minister of Finance does not disagree with our proposal. He suggests, however, that the Canadian representative in the Negotiating Committee should announce certain "conditions and safeguards" which in effect would alter the character and probably much lessen the amount of our contribution, and would have certain political implications which cannot be ignored. These conditions and safeguards are that:

(a) while the Canadian representative would announce that Canada is prepared to make a maximum contribution of $750,000, he would state that the amount which the Canadian Government will actually make available to the Agency will be related to the share assumed by countries (other than the

The memorandum is first rate. Is Finance referring to a contribution for the year ending June 20/52. This seems unlikely since if the money had to be rolled over before June 30 it would scarcely be possible to carry out their recommendations on controlled releases.

Can't we settle our contribution for the year 51-52 & for the year 52-53 at the same time — say $250,000 for 51-52 and [$]250,000-500,000 for 52-53? E. R[eid]

United States, the United Kingdom and France) which have responsibilities and interests in the area comparable to Canada's;

(b) the Canadian representative would further state that the rate of release and the nature of the Canadian contribution will be subject to agreement between the Canadian Government and the Director-General of the Agency. In practice, our contribution would only be released as the Canadian Government (meaning presumably officials of this Department and of the Department of Finance) becomes convinced that a resettlement project is ripe for financing and is receiving the full support of the Arab government(s) in which it is to be carried out. The nature of the contribution then given will depend on the state of the Canadian economy at the time and in particular on whether certain surplus commodities can be offered to the Agency;

(c) provision for the Canadian contribution should be made in the Supplementary Estimates for 1952-53 in order to enable us to maintain a "direct control" over the Canadian contribution. Inclusion of the item in the Final Supplementary Estimates for 1951-52, as we had originally proposed, would deny us this control as payment would have to be made before March 31, 1952.

4. These "conditions and safeguards" are presented by Finance as suggestions intended to make our proposals "more acceptable on purely financial grounds." They raise, however, some important principles of international co-operation which, if they were to be regarded as sound and applied indiscriminately to other agencies to which we make voluntary contributions, would, in my opinion, make the task of administering the agencies most difficult and go a long way towards defeating the purposes for which we lend financial assistance. For these reasons I should like to discuss the above conditions in some detail and to examine the question of their acceptability in the case of our proposed contribution to UNRWAP.

Tying of the Canadian Contribution to those of Other Countries

5. This is a fairly well-established practice. It is not objectionable insofar as it is intended to ensure that our contribution bears a reasonable relationship to those of other countries and to induce them to contribute, and provided that the application of the technique will in fact promote these objects. Whenever used, the "matching formula" should be flexible and should not be so construed as to defeat in part the purposes for which the contribution has been approved by the Cabinet and thus to reduce the political advantages which Canada may derive in contributing.

6. I might illustrate this by discussing the "matching formula" which was used in announcing our contribution to the 1952 Technical Assistance Programme. The under-developed countries, whose friendship and confidence we are trying to win and for whose benefit the technical assistance programme is being carried out, pledged roughly the same total amount in 1952 as in 1951. On the other hand, the United Kingdom, presumably because of its critical financial situation at home, reduced its contribution by $868,000 and Australia by $200,000. These reductions made it impossible to reach this year the $20,000,000 goal which, in their absence, would have been exceeded by a good margin. Because of the "defection" of the United Kingdom and Australia, and by virtue of the "matching formula" used by the United States and Canada, the former's maximum contribution was automatically cut by $600,000 and ours by $100,000. As a result of a set of circumstances for which the under-developed countries bear no direct responsibility, less money will be available to finance a programme planned for their exclusive benefit. The political implications of this development, which was probably neither foreseen nor desired, are obvious. It seems to me that our matching formula in this case should have been based on contributions to be pledged by the under-developed countries themselves in order to emphasize the importance which Canada attaches to the principle of self-help, and also perhaps to a smaller extent and certainly in a more flexible way on contributions from developed countries in a position truly comparable to our own. While contributions from advanced countries remain very substantial, the conditions under which they were offered may seriously jeopardize the political and psychological advantages that we should normally derive from economic assistance of this kind.

7. As a general rule it seems to me that whenever we can establish that we have both a responsibility and an interest in participating in a programme, we should attempt to translate that responsibility and that interest into a minimum contribution which we would be prepared to give regardless of whether other countries recognize their corresponding obligations. This minimum contribution might reflect our misgivings about the programme itself and its likelihood of success. Once this minimum contribution has been determined to the satisfaction of all departments concerned and can be firmly pledged, then it would be appropriate to state that our contribution will be increased up to a maximum amount, depending on the contributions of others.<sup>118</sup> In calculating this maximum contribution, we might be guided by our relative capacity to pay, of which our assessment (3.35%) to the regular budget of the United Nations is the best available measurement. It could even be higher where political considerations warrant it. On the other hand, it could be lower where we have definite misgivings about the programme.<sup>119</sup> In this way, we would build up positive results as our contribution is being increased instead of creating frustration and ill-will as it is being decreased. We would not give away any more money in the process, but we would give it in a much more effective manner.

8. This Department's proposal that Canada give $750,000, or a little less than 1% of the total required by UNRWAPR for the year ending June 30, 1952, was to my mind a minimum contribution in the above sense. Finance interpreted it as a maximum contribution to be scaled down if countries (other than the United States, the United Kingdom and France) failed to contribute or where the U.S. is bearing a good deal more than 33%, or where certain powers other than Canada have special interests in the area or the programme. E. R[eid] adequately. The last section of this memorandum attempts to reconcile these two conflicting views.

9. It is perhaps a bit presumptuous on our part to think that we can in any way influence other countries to contribute by threatening to reduce a contribution which may already be very low in comparison with our capacity to pay.<sup>120</sup> I should think that this technique would only stand a reasonable chance of success if at the same time we can convincingly demonstrate that we are doing all that we can, that some real sacrifice is requested of us, in other words that we are prepared to give to the full measure of our relative capacity to pay if other countries are willing to co-operate. Nevertheless, we cannot ignore Finance's justified misgivings at the failure of a large number of other countries to contribute to UNRWAPR in the past. We should therefore try to meet their requirement in such a way as will be more acceptable to us on political grounds.

Tying of the Rate of Release of the Canadian Contribution to Performance

10. This is a procedure which was applied by the United Kingdom and the United States in the case of their pledged contributions to the United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency. Both Finance and this Department objected strongly at the time on the grounds that it was most unfair to those countries, such as Canada, which had paid their contributions outright; that the consequent uncertainty as to the availability of funds made the programming and administration of the Agency most difficult and that it permitted undue interference by individual governments in the affairs of the Agency. We were right in principle although admittedly the peculiar circumstances of Korean Relief mitigated the effects of the policy followed by the United States and the United Kingdom. Now Finance is suggesting that we should ourselves invoke this procedure in order to serve notice "that our continuing co-operation is contingent upon the development and maintenance of conditions and standards of performance that will contribute to the attainment of the ultimate objective."

11. I suggest that if all contributors were to introduce a similar proviso, the Agency would be faced with some 50 or 60 interpretations of "standards of performance" and "ultimate objective,"<sup>121</sup> depending on each country's own concepts and particular interests. Each one would undoubtedly try to promote its own ends, especially if these had not been accepted in the international forum responsible for defining "standards of performance" and "ultimate objective". Such a development would soon divest international co-operation of any meaning.

The real purpose of the matching formula is not to influence other countries but to ensure that our contribution is not out of line with contributions from other countries. E. R[eid]

I agree that we should oppose this doctrine except on very rare occasions where it may be applicable. E. R[eid]

12. Any guarantees or safeguards which are necessary to ensure that our contribution will be spent for the purposes for which it is intended should be worked out by the international organ concerned. Ample machinery to that end already exists. In UNRWAPR, the authority to enter into certain types of expenditure and the conditions under which the plan is to be carried out are contained in a resolution of the General Assembly. The Director-General has to submit to the Assembly an annual report on his activities, and to the Board of Auditors of the United Nations an annual statement on his accounts. An advisory committee has been appointed to provide him with policy and financial directives as he may require. To the extent that his "standards of performance", and his efforts to attain the "ultimate objective" set down by the Assembly are unsatisfactory, he will expose himself to blame and criticism in the international organ concerned and will lose the confidence and support of member states.

13. There might be a good case for additional measures designed to protect voluntary contributions to international organizations engaged in relief, resettlement or technical assistance. These, however, should be worked out internationally. Final judgment as to when, how and in what direction an agency should spend its money should in no circumstances be left in the hands of any one government. It may be desirable, for instance, for the General Assembly to stipulate that any funds, which in a given period cannot be used by an agency for the purposes for which authority to seek voluntary contributions has been given, should revert on a pro rata basis to the original contributors. This is a sound financial procedure which is strictly applied in the case of funds raised through assessments and which could well be extended to voluntary contributions. This method of financial control would provide all contributing governments with equal and satisfactory guarantees. For this reason it would, in fact, be much more effective in promoting the objectives laid down by the Assembly than attempts by individual governments whose motives are not always beyond question or reproach, to foster the same (and in some cases different) ends.

Provision of our Contribution to UNRWAPR in the Supplementary Estimates for 1952-53

14. Our proposed contribution was to have been made to the Agency for its fiscal year July 1, 1951 to June 30, 1952. If the amount is to be included in the Supplementary Estimates for 1952-53, the item will not be approved by Parliament before June 1952 at the earliest and the money will not be released until that date. This is the reason why we believed that inclusion of an item in the 1951-52 Final Supplementary Estimates was necessary if we were to make a contribution at all during the Agency's current fiscal year. This is also the reason why we abandoned, in favour of a fixed and relatively small contribution, the formula previously suggested by Mr. Reid for a token Canadian contribution which would be increased in a given proportion depending on amounts offered by countries other than the United States, the United Kingdom and France. As our contribution would have had to be paid before

March 31, 1952, we thought that by that date the pledges of others might not be sufficiently known to enable us to apply Mr. Reid's formula. However, we might now revise our proposal in the sense of Mr. Reid's suggestion.

15. It seems to me that the reason put forward by Finance for recommending that the Canadian contribution should be included in the 1952-53 Supplementary Estimates, namely that this "would permit continuing control of the rate of releases" is (regardless of the merit of this proposal) not a very convincing one. Assuming that our contribution could not be announced at the next meeting of the Negotiating Committee on March 26, very little time would be left for the Canadian Government to examine the Agency's projects before June 30, 1952 and decide whether they are worth financing. It may be, however, that our contribution could be regarded as having been made for the first period, if we so indicated, while being carried over into the second period.

Conclusions

16. If we were to accept all of Finance's "safeguards and conditions", our contribution, though in theory $750,000, would not at the present stage of negotiations amount to more than $125,000, if a "direct relationship" is to be established between the Canadian contribution and the share assumed by countries other than the United States, the United Kingdom and France. Out of the $12,000,000 to be obtained from these countries, only $2,000,000, or one-sixth of the total, has so far been secured. Such a small Canadian contribution would go a long way towards defeating the purpose for which our contribution is to be made. It is true that it would be increased later as contributions from others were pledged. However, the psychological effect of announcing initially a contribution of that order would probably be more harmful than complete abstention on our part, particularly since other countries (e.g. Australia, New Zealand) have already offered appreciably higher amounts without any strings attached.

17. I suggest that we make a new proposal to Finance recommending that:

a) the Canadian representative should be authorized to announce before the Negotiating Committee that Canada, subject to approval by Parliament, will make a minimum contribution of $400,000 for the year July 1, 1951 to June 30, 1952. However, if contributions pledged by countries other than the United States, the United Kingdom and France exceed $5,000,000 Canada will be prepared to increase its own contribution by $50,000 for each additional $1,000,000 offered up to a maximum of $750,000 when the $12,000,000 goal is reached;

b) the Canadian representative should state that the nature (i.e. whether in cash or in kind) of the Canadian contribution will be subject to agreement between the Canadian Government and the Director-General of the Agency;

c) the Canadian representative should explicitly reserve the Canadian position with regard to contributions to the programme for the following two years, and state that a Canadian decision to make such further contributions will largely depend on the success of the plan during the first year, on evidence that local governments in the area are co-operating with the Agency in the administration of relief and re-integration projects, and on the willingness shown by countries in a position comparable to Canada's to share the financial burden;

d) an amount of $750,000 be included in the Supplementary Estimates for the fiscal year 1952-53 to provide for the Canadian contribution.

18. The only point on which these recommendations fail fully to meet Finance's conditions is the one concerning the direct control over the rate of releases. We should explain to Finance why we disagree with this proposal in principle and suggest to them ways and means, as was attempted in paragraph 13, whereby better financial control could be secured on an international basis.

Ottawa, April 25, 1952

Dear Dr. Clark,

RE: CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO THE UNITED NATIONS RELIEF & WORKS AGENCY FOR PALESTINE REFUGEES,
1951-52 AND 1952-53

The comments and suggestions contained in your letter of March 14 on this subject have been examined in this Department with great attention. Largely as a result of your views but because of one or two other considerations as well, we now propose a somewhat different approach to the problem of deciding on a contribution to the United Nations Relief & Works Agency for Palestine Refugees (UNRWAPR) which is set out in the attached proposed Memorandum to Cabinet.†

You will see that the proposed Memorandum differs from the earlier one sent you under my letter of March 10 in a number of important respects. The basic recommendations now would be:

a) That no contribution be made to UNRWAPR for its fiscal year ending June 30, 1952;

b) That Cabinet should give authority to announce an outright contribution for 1952-53 of $750,000 and that this amount should be placed in the Supplementary Estimates for 1952-53;

c) That authority also be given for announcing that Canada would be prepared to make a further contribution before the end of the calendar year 1952 conditional upon the "matching" of Canadian contributions by other countries with similar responsibilities and upon the Arab countries concerned not showing an indisposition to co-operate with the programme of the Agency.

The reasons for these recommendations are set out in the proposed Memorandum to Cabinet but I might elaborate on some points. With regard to a) above, I think you will agree that a "too little and too late" contribution for 1951-52 would not have carried any particular advantage and would have made it necessary to ask Cabinet for funds for the same Agency twice within a very short time. There is the further consideration, of course, that the Agency has in effect closed its books for its current fiscal year. All in all, it seems better not to complicate matters with a rather small, last minute contribution for 1951-52 but to start clean on the question of the 1952-53 contribution and be in the van of contributors for the new fiscal year.

As to b) we have felt that, if we are to contribute, the Agency would have to have some firm, minimum figure for the Canadian contribution if it were to be able to assess sufficiently closely the resources it could count on to plan and execute its programme. Our financial support of the Agency must, as you have pointed out, be contingent upon a reasonable expectation that it will be possible to carry out the Agency's programme with efficiency. Since the reservations of the Government were expressed during the course of the Sixth Session of the U.N. General Assembly what evidence we have (and it is admittedly rather meagre) suggests that the Arab states neighbouring Israel have, in fact, been cooperating with Blandford. The new agreement between the Agency and the Jordan Government tends to confirm this evidence. Thus it seems possible, on the basis of present satisfaction (or, perhaps, absence of dissatisfaction) with Arab cooperation to pledge a firm contribution in the normal way, without any special conditions. The amount suggested for this initial contribution is $750,000, an amount equal to that which we suggested earlier for 1951-52.

If the Canadian conditions were satisfactorily met and we had no real fault to find with UNRWAPR or the way other nations were contributing to it before the end of the calendar year, Canada might contribute up to a further $500,000 at the beginning of 1953. Any amounts less than this would serve to demonstrate the degree of our dissatisfaction with the activities of the Agency or with the demonstrated willingness of other countries to bear their share of the load.

In this way I trust we may be able to reconcile very largely the political and humanitarian aims which we intend to serve by contributing to UNRWAPR with the financial and administrative considerations you have raised in relation to the method of contribution.

You will notice that there has been included in the Memorandum a short paragraph suggesting that the Director General of UNRWAPR should give some attention to the possibility of purchasing commodities in surplus supply in Canada for the use of his programme.

I do not need to say that if we are to proceed along these lines and include this item in the Supplementary Estimates an early decision by Cabinet will be required. I hope, therefore, that you will agree with this general approach, in which case we shall submit the matter to Cabinet as soon as possible. In any case, I shall value your comments on the proposed Memorandum.

Yours sincerely,

ESCOTT REID

CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, May 3, 1952

Dear Sir,

CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO THE UNITED NATIONS
RELIEF AND WORKS AGENCY FOR PALESTINE REFUGEES,
1951-52 AND 1952-53

I have your letter (File 10170-C-40) of April 25th advising that you have decided against recommending a contribution to the UNRWAPR programme for the fiscal year ending June 30th, 1952, and that you propose instead to request Cabinet to authorise:

(a) an immediate contribution of $750,000 to the Agency programme for 1952-53; and

(b) an announcement that Canada would be prepared to make a further contribution at the beginning of 1953 if, at that time, the Canadian Government is satisfied with the financial response of other member states and the progress achieved in carrying out the programme.

As you know, we have never questioned the need for a solution to this difficult problem. At the same time, we have been seriously concerned about the apparent failure to achieve lasting results from past expenditures in the area and have expressed misgivings about the provision of further funds for Agency programmes without better guarantees of Arab cooperation. We have also been anxious to ensure that Canada is not called upon to contribute more than other governments with comparable interests and responsibilities.

Accordingly, while I have noted the reasons you advanced (in paragraph 6 of your memorandum) for a Canadian contribution and your current belief that the Blandford Plan "stands a good chance of success", it has not been encouraging to note other reports, such as that appearing in the May 1st issue of the New York Times, which take a more gloomy view of prospects in the area.

However, these are factors which will have to be weighed by Cabinet when it decides whether it favours further Canadian participation. If Cabinet decides to authorise any Canadian contribution, I can see certain advantages in your new approach.

In the first place, I agree that it would be preferable to announce an early contribution to the 1953 programme rather than make a belated contribution to last year's programme.

Secondly, there would seem to be considerable merit in your proposal to divide any Canadian contribution into two parts, a first (firm) contribution to be given immediately and a second (contingent) amount to be withheld until the response of other member states is known and we are able to judge the probable effectiveness of the programme.

While these proposals partially meet our original suggestions, I am doubtful that we should provide such a large initial contribution. Since the objective is to provide new and permanent homes for the refugees, would it not be more prudent to make a smaller initial payment and withhold the larger share until we have more satisfactory evidence that the funds will be used for the intended purposes? A contribution of $750,000 represents more than one-half of the amount you are recommending as our overall contribution. If we are to participate, I would favour a smaller initial payment (not exceeding $500,000), with the larger portion withheld until we receive convincing evidence that these funds can be used effectively for resettlement.

I note also that you intend to remind the Director-General of the possibility of making purchases in Canada for use in his programme. Although I have no desire to recommend a "tied" contribution or to insist that the Agency accept commodities which cannot effectively be used for its operations, I believe we should ensure that every opportunity will be afforded to Canadian producers to sell their products to the Agency. As you know, some difficulty was experienced recently in inducing United Nations procurement agencies to make purchases in Canada for the Korean programme. In the circumstances, would it not be desirable to approach this question in the way suggested in my letter of March 10th? If we were to make the Canadian contribution "subject to agreement between the Secretary-General and the Canadian Government," we would then be assured of an opportunity to suggest purchasing arrangements that would be in line with our supply situation at any particular time.

Yours very truly,

W.C. CLARK

ASSISTANCE TO PALESTINE REFUGEES

37. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported that, since 1948, Arab refugees from the war in Palestine had existed chiefly on relief provided by the United Nations which had recognized its responsibility for the problem and consistently tried to find a solution. Not only humanitarian factors but important political considerations were involved since these refugees were a significant element in the instability of the Middle East whose security was vital to the North Atlantic area.

In January, 1952, the U.N. Assembly had accepted the "Blandford Plan" calling for the expenditure over three years of $50 million for relief and $200 million for the integration of the refugees into the life of Israel's neighbours. Some $67 million had been contributed for the year ending June 30th, 1952, and it was estimated that about $128 million and $55 million respectively would be required for the two following years.

The experts felt the plan stood a good chance of succeeding. It would be preferable for Canada not to contribute to the first year of the plan, now almost over. For the second year a reasonable contribution would seem to be in the neighbourhood of 1 percent of the funds required, that is, slightly over $1 million. He recommended that it be indicated at this time that Canada would provide $600,000 and would make a further contribution at the beginning of 1953 if it appeared that other countries were making reasonable contributions and the Middle Eastern states were cooperating in carrying out the plan. The second contribution should be up to $600,000. Payments would be subject to an understanding that attention would be given to procurement in Canada by the U.N. agency administering the plan of commodities required, particularly those in surplus supply. Officials of the Department of Finance had expressed agreement with these proposals.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

38. The Prime Minister wondered, if Canada showed it felt some responsibility for success of the plan, whether it might be pressed to contribute on a basis of capacity to pay which would mean providing something like 5 percent rather than about 1 percent of the funds required for the second year.

39. Mr. Pearson said that since the first contribution to the U.N. agency concerned with the Palestine refugees, there had never been question of a capacity to pay basis. He would not propose, in any case, that more than $1.2 million be contributed for the year beginning July 1st, 1952. It had always been felt that Canada did not have the same degree of responsibility as the countries with special strategic and economic interests in the Middle East.

40. The Cabinet, after further discussion, approved the recommendations of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and, subject to the approval of the Minister of Finance, agreed that:

(1) the Canadian representative on the United Nations Negotiating Committee for Extra-budgetary Funds announce that Canada:

(a) would contribute $600,000 to the U.N. Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees for the year beginning July 1st, 1952, subject to approval by Parliament;

(b) would make a further contribution to the agency at the beginning of 1953 provided conditions were such that it appeared likely that the agency's programme could be successfully carried out and that contributions from other countries with similar responsibilities were such as to justify a further contribution by Canada;

(2) the second contribution for the year beginning July 1st, 1952, be up to $600,000;

(3) payment of the contributions be subject to an agreement with the Director General of the U.N. agency to ensure that attention was given by it to procurement in Canada of commodities required for its operations;

(4) an amount of $600,000 be included in the Supplementary Estimates for 1952-53 for the initial contribution.

UNRWAPR regarding Canada's contribution to UNRWAPR for the period July 1, 1952 to June 30, 1953.

2. We discussed at some length the provision in the Cabinet memorandum of May 9, 1952, which authorized the contribution, which reads as follows:

"Payment of the Canadian contribution be subject to agreement between the Director General of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees and the Canadian Government in order to ensure that attention is given by the agency to procurement in Canada of commodities required by the agency for its operations."

Mr. Pollock said that the view of the Department of Finance was that this provision did not mean that our contribution was tied in any direct way to the purchase of commodities in Canada, nor that we would wish to interfere in the purchasing policies of UNRWAPR. We wished, however, to be in a position to draw to the attention of the Director General the existence of any possible surplus commodities in Canada that he might be able to use, and wanted his assurances that attention would be given to the procurement in Canada of commodities required by the Agency for its operations. Mr. Pollock believed that these assurances would enable us to conclude the "agreement" with the Director General regarding payment of the contribution, in accordance with the terms under which Parliament authorized the contribution.<sup>125</sup> scheme involving a total expenditure of $250,000,000 divided as follows between relief and resettlement or "reintegration":

	(million U.S. dollars)
	Relief	"Reintegration"
July 1, 1951 — June 30, 1952	27	50
July 1, 1952 — June 30, 1953	18	100
July 1, 1953 — June 30, 1954	5	50

2. In the special joint report of the Director and Advisory Commission of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency of October 17, 1952, it was noted that the projects for the resettlement of the refugees had not gone ahead as fast as had been hoped. Hence, a revision of the financial plan was suggested for the fiscal year June, 1952, to June, 1953, which would involve the expenditure of $23,000,000 for relief and $100,000,000 for resettlement projects with the additional proviso that the Director might make such transfers between funds as might be deemed desirable. When the question was considered in the Ad Hoc Political Committee, the four powers represented on the Advisory Commission of the Agency (France, Turkey, United Kingdom, United States) put forward a resolution authorizing the Agency to increase its relief budget for the fiscal year 1952-53 from the figure of $18,000,000 approved under the original plan to the figure of $23,000,000. By the resolution, the Director would also be authorized to make further adjustments to maintain adequate standards. The relief budget for the fiscal year ending June, 1954, would be in the order of $18,000,000. The Agency would also be authorized under the terms of this resolution to allocate any funds remaining for reintegration schemes according to time schedules deemed appropriate up to June 30, 1954.

3. The four power resolution was adopted by the Ad Hoc Political Committee by 50 votes (including Canada) to none with seven abstentions. When the question was considered in plenary session the Committee's resolution was adopted by 48 votes in favour (including Canada), none against and six abstentions.

The Canadian Position and the Views of Other Delegations

4. Canada has already made contributions amounting to over $3,000,000 to the efforts of the United Nations to solve the Palestine refugee problem. In his statement in the Ad Hoc Committee, the Canadian Representative (Mr. Johnson) said that the Canadian Government had been heartened by recent public statements of Middle Eastern leaders offering encouragement to such refugees as were ready to try to build up a new life outside of Palestine. Nevertheless, the generous impulses of some peoples might lose their warmth unless they were convinced that opportunities for rehabilitation to normal life and not mere relief were being offered to the victims of war. He noted that the countries in a position to render the most important assistance in the long run were undoubtedly those who were closest geographically and, in other ways, to the refugees themselves. Mr. Johnson also said that it was neither sound nor equitable if certain great powers and a small number of other states assumed almost the whole financial responsibility for a United Nations project. He appealed for wider financial support by members of the United Nations generally.

5. The position of Australia and New Zealand which have both made substantial contributions for the relief and resettlement of Palestine refugees was very similar to the Canadian position. Both emphasized that the degree of support which the sheltering Arab countries offered to the United Nations Relief and Works Agency would have a direct bearing on the willingness of many countries, including their own, to make further contributions.

6. The representatives of Arab states emphasized the rights of the refugees of repatriation to and compensation from Israel and directed attention to the trying conditions under which the refugees were living and the debilitating effect of life in camps over a protracted period. Certain Arab representatives suggested that the figure for relief should be in the amount of $27,000,000 instead of $23,000,000 for the current fiscal year. No formal proposal was made to this effect, however, and, in the end, only one Arab State (Iraq) failed to support the four power proposal. The other states which abstained on the recommendation included the five countries from the Soviet bloc, which have made no contributions for the relief of Palestine Arab refugees, and Chile which, because it was not in a position to contribute to the relief budget for the current year, felt it should abstain on the resolution.

UNICEF

My Minister has received a letter from Mr. Maurice Pate, the Executive Director of UNICEF, soliciting a Canadian contribution for 1952. A copy of Mr. Pate's letter is attached.†

2. As stated in Mr. Pate's letter, 32 governments contributed to UNICEF in 1951. You will recall that the Canadian Government contributed $500,000 of which $290,000 was in cash and $210,000 in dried salt codfish. Attached is a copy of a statement we have obtained from the Fund, showing the total contributions received from January 1, 1951 to December 28, 1951.† This statement shows that the major contributors (other than Canada) were as follows:

United States	$5,750,000
Australia	560,000
France	500,000
Thailand	464,626
Yugoslavia	400,000
Switzerland	327,600

Also attached is a statement showing the total contributions received by UNICEF from its inception to December 28, 1951 by country and a table giving a breakdown of this statement by year through December, 1950.†

3. The target budget for 1952 is the equivalent of US$30 million. The Australian and New Zealand Governments have already announced contributions equivalent to $560,000 and $280,000 respectively. The French Government has pledged $500,00[0] and the United Kingdom will probably make a contribution of at least $140,000. Insofar as the United States is concerned we have been informed that the Administration will seek an early appropriation of $12 million. Our Embassy in Washington, however, has reported that it is not likely that more than half of this amount will actually be appropriated by Congress. Pledges for 1952, other than those mentioned above, are listed in the table showing contributions received during 1951.

4. This Department has been considering a possible Canadian contribution for 1952 and in doing so has taken the following factors into account:

5. On November 28 last, the Third Committee of the General Assembly passed a resolution making a "most earnest appeal" to Governments and private persons to "contribute within the limits of their possibilities to the Fund during 1952." The Canadian Delegation voted in favour of this resolution but in doing so made it clear that such support in no way implied a commitment to contribute.

6. For some months now, there has been a shift in emphasis in UNICEF's activities from what might be called emergency relief to long-range projects. The Fund is continuing to meet emergencies as in Korea and Palestine and more recently in Italy, but for the most part assistance is now being given for two purposes; (a) building up of a country's own maternal and child health and welfare services, including the conduct of large-scale campaigns against communicable disease, and (b) child-feeding and related undertakings. At the present moment the Fund is conducting operations in the under-developed countries, particularly of Asia and the Middle East, which areas, from the political point of view, are of considerable importance at the present time.

7. The Fund's activities are predominantly concentrated on projects which cannot be financed from other sources (technical assistance programmes, fellowship programmes and so forth. Moreover, UNICEF has been able over a period of years, to build up a solid reputation for responsible relief work and by various means has been able to set up machinery to ensure not only that its funds are spent to the best advantage, but that its supplies of milk, drugs, clothing and so forth are actually received by the persons for whom they are intended. Canada has actively participated in the work of the Executive Committee and, as you know, a Canadian, Mrs. D.B. Sinclair,<sup>127</sup> is now Chairman of that Committee.

8. As you are aware, the Fund also receives private contributions as a result of appeals made by various welfare and charity organisations, individuals and groups. Insofar as Canada is concerned, it has been evident that a Government contribution provides a stimulus to those endeavours which give individual Canadians an opportunity to play a tangible part in the work of one of the United Nations' more important agencies.

9. In the light of the above consideration my Minister is prepared to recommend to the Cabinet that the Canadian Government make a contribution for 1952 in the amount of $500,000, it being understood that such a contribution will be made up of $300,000 in cash, earmarked for UNICEF purchases in Canada, and $200,000 earmarked for the purchase of some Canadian product in surplus supply during the coming year which UNICEF can make use of in connection with its programme. If no such surplus product should become available then that portion of our contribution would be paid to UNICEF on the same condition as the $300,000 in cash.

10. Before drafting a submission to Cabinet along these lines, however, I should be grateful to have your views.

Dear Sir,

UNICEF

I have your letter of February 1, informing us that your Department is prepared to recommend that a contribution of $500,000 be made to UNICEF for 1952 and asking for our views. You also propose that UNICEF be required to spend the whole amount of the Canadian contribution in Canada, with $200,000 earmarked for the purchase of surplus products if these develop during the year.

I think that the amount of any future Canadian contribution to UNICEF and the conditions attached to its use should be carefully considered in the light of our views on the future of this organization. When the question of the continuation of UNICEF was being discussed at the 1950 General Assembly, Canada and a number of other responsible countries expressed doubts about the need for a separate children's fund, since the immediate post-war emergency had passed, and since it was evident that UNICEF's programme would overlap the activities of a number of other United Nations bodies. However, it was finally agreed to extend the life of UNICEF until 1953 and to request voluntary contributions from member countries to finance its operations. Since then, sufficient funds have been contributed, mainly by the United States, Canada, Australia and France, to allow UNICEF to carry on its programme.

The continuation of UNICEF as a separate organization seems now, more than ever, to be wasteful of resources and effort. Although contributions have fallen off sharply (from about $30 million in 1949 to about $10 million in 1951), no significant reductions have been made in the number of staff or in the level of administrative costs. These costs, which in 1951 were about $2,000,000, amounted to about one-fifth of total contributions in that year. The wisdom of maintaining this large administration to carry out a diminishing programme seems particularly doubtful since the UNICEF programme has become, in most respects, a duplication of activities that are, or could be, carried out by other United Nations bodies through both their regular and technical assistance programmes.

If Canada and other donor countries maintain the size of their contributions, I am afraid that this will give the impression that we are prepared to support UNICEF for an indefinite period. Contributions on a decreasing scale, on the other hand, would indicate clearly that contributing countries are looking to the contraction and eventual winding up of this organization. For this reason we believe that it would be appropriate to reduce the Canadian contribution to something in the neighbourhood of $400,000, as compared with our 1951 contribution of $470,000 (U.S.).

I am enclosing a copy of a memorandum prepared in this Department, setting out in more detail the considerations upon which the above recommendation is based.

The conditions attached to any Canadian contribution should, I think, be consistent with the views we have expressed concerning the nature of the UNICEF programme. We have urged UNICEF to concentrate upon advisory and technical services to assist countries in developing their own child health and welfare services. However, to the extent that the UNICEF programme remains a programme of supply and emergency relief, it would seem reasonable to require that UNICEF spend part of the Canadian contribution on purchases in Canada, including purchases of commodities in surplus supply.

Yours very truly,

W. C. CLARK

CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO UNICEF

External Affairs has sent a letter informing us that Mr. Pearson is prepared to recommend to the Cabinet a Canadian contribution to UNICEF for 1952 in the amount of $500,000. External Affairs proposes that this contribution of $500,000 "be made up of $300,000 in cash, earmarked for UNICEF purchases in Canada, and $200,000 earmarked for the purchase of some Canadian product in surplus supply during the coming year which UNICEF can make use of in connection with its programme. If no such surplus product should become available then that portion of our contribution would be paid to UNICEF on the same condition as the $300,000 in cash."

The attached draft reply to External Affairs is based on the following considerations.

Background

In the five years since its establishment in 1946, UNICEF has received over $162 million, including $117 million from governments, $12 million from private sources and $33 million from UNRRA assets. Canadian contributions have amounted to $7,192,727 from the Government and $1,486,289 from private sources.

At the end of the war, UNICEF was established to provide food and medical supplies to meet emergency needs of children in war-damaged countries of Europe and Asia. Before long, however, pressure developed in the U.N. for an extension of UNICEF activities to the underdeveloped areas of the world, on an expanded and permanent basis.

It was the Canadian view, shared by the United States and a number of other responsible countries that while the United Nations might carry on some activity in the field of child welfare, the activities of UNICEF should be brought to an end when the emergency period was over; any continuing United Nations effort should be on a modest scale and in the form of assistance to countries in developing child welfare services of their own. The United Kingdom advanced the more extreme view that there was no need for any special United Nations activity in the field of child welfare.

By J.J. Deutsch and W.F. Stone; the latter dealt with United Nations financial matters while on loan to Department of Finance.

In 1950, however, the United Nations Assembly voted in favour of extending the life of UNICEF for another three years, with emphasis on activities in underdeveloped countries. Despite Canadian and United States efforts, an amendment requiring concentration upon technical and advisory services was rejected. A Canadian amendment was accepted, however, emphasizing the desirability of strengthening permanent child health and welfare services, and Canada voted in favour of the final resolution to extend the life of UNICEF.

At the recent Assembly in Paris most of the contributing countries praised the work of UNICEF in general terms, but avoided reference to the question of its continuation. The Canadian delegate, however, reminded the Assembly that UNICEF was only "a particular aspect of technical assistance" and said that "at some stage it might appear more efficient and practical to deal with the needs of children under the technical assistance budget rather than by a special fund."

Although annual contributions have decreased sharply since 1949 (from about $30 million in 1949, to about $20 million in 1950 and $10 million in 1951), sufficient income has been received to allow UNICEF to carry out a continuing programme, and to maintain its staff of some 280. The Canadian Government contributed $546,000 (U.S.) in 1950 and $470,000 (U.S.) in 1951.<sup>129</sup>

If donor countries maintain the size of their contributions, it is likely to give the impression that these countries will be agreeable to the continuation of UNICEF. If it is desirable to avoid giving this impression, and to strengthen the case for winding-up UNICEF, any further contributions by Canada should be on a decreasing scale. Canada should also urge a curtailment of those parts of the UNICEF programme that are, or could be carried out by other United Nations bodies.

Nature of Present Programme

Since 1950, UNICEF has progressively reduced its direct child feeding, and has switched its main effort from Europe to underdeveloped countries. Its present programme mainly consists of providing supplies for use in joint technical assistance projects in the field of child health and welfare. A smaller (but substantial) part of its resources is used to aid capital development and for emergency relief. Its programme consequently overlaps the activities of a number of other United Nations bodies. UNICEF, however, concentrates on problems of child health, and welfare and for this reason has gained a special measure of public support in contributing countries.

As part of technical assistance projects in the field of child health, UNICEF provides drugs for anti-TB and anti-VD campaigns, DDT for anti-malaria

It might be noted that the form of the Canadian contribution in 1951 was somewhat inconsistent with Canada's attitude toward the role of UNICEF. Canada has urged UNICEF to concentrate on advisory services and long range programmes; but the 1951 contribution included a donation of fish valued at $210,000.

campaigns, and equipment for maternal and child health clinics, etc. Foreign medical personnel, selected by WHO (but often paid by UNICEF) use the supplies both for direct medical treatment and for training local health staffs. This aspect of the UNICEF programme appears to be identical with the sort of technical assistance offered by WHO.

In the field of capital development UNICEF provides imported equipment for milk processing plants, DDT factories, and anti-biotic manufacturing plants. While efforts of this sort probably make efficient use of UNICEF funds, the concept of grants for capital development in underdeveloped countries through the U.N. has not been accepted by many contributing countries. Moreover, the policy of assisting the establishment of DDT and anti-biotic manufacturing has been criticized on the grounds that such products are not primarily for the benefit of children.

UNICEF has continued its emergency relief programmes in distressed areas, for which it is able to use contributions in kind. However, its main efforts — among Palestine refugees and in Korea — are in areas where other United Nations agencies are also acting.

Certain of UNICEF's activities in Europe appear to be of doubtful priority. Despite objections by the Canadian representative on the Executive Board, UNICEF has given $1 million for research work at an 'International Children's Centre' in Paris, and is committed to give $660,000 more. UNICEF also provides medical equipment for research in France and Italy in the field of premature births, which would appear to be a project of less than immediate priority for UNICEF.

Administration

Administration costs have been running at $2,000,000-$2,300,000 per year for a staff of some 280. Of these, 111 are located at Headquarters in New York and 66 in Paris. The remainder are elsewhere in Europe (18), Asia (57) and Latin America (24). The number of staff in Paris seems to be unduly high, considering that UNICEF's main activities have been directed away from Europe.

Despite a sharp decrease in UNICEF's operational budget over the past 3 years there has been no significant decrease in its staff or its administrative budget, presumably because of the extension of its activities into new areas. Administrative expenses now drain off as much as one-fifth of annual contributions.

Contributions

It is probable that total 1952 contributions will approximate the amount of contributions received in 1951. We have been informed that the United States Administration will seek an appropriation of $12 million for 1952, of which half is likely to be approved by Congress. Australia, France and the United Kingdom have pledged for 1952 the equivalent of their 1951 contributions of $560,000, $500,000 and $140,000 respectively. New Zealand has pledged $280,000.

Conclusions

Canada has reluctantly accepted the continuation of UNICEF as a separate organization beyond the post-war emergency period. Its present programme overlaps to a large extent the activities of other United Nations organizations, and a high proportion of UNICEF funds is spent on administration. Since other United Nations bodies have now developed their separate programmes of technical assistance, the continuation of UNICEF as a separate organization, with a large secretariat, seems more than ever to be wasteful of resources and efforts. The question of the future of UNICEF will come before the General Assembly in 1953.

The size of further contribution by Canada to UNICEF should be considered in the light of Canadian policy toward the continuation of the organization. To avoid giving the impression that Canada is prepared to support the indefinite continuation of UNICEF Canadian contributions should be progressively decreased in the future. Canada contributed $500,000 in 1951. For 1952, a contribution of less than this amount, say $400,000, might be recommended.

In transmitting its 1952 contribution, Canada should remind the Director-General of Canadian doubts about the need for continuing UNICEF permanently. Attention should be drawn to the fact that most aspects of the UNICEF programme are now being, or could be, carried out by other United Nations bodies to which Canada is contributing in increasing amounts.

The Canadian representative on the UNICEF Executive Board should ask that any necessary economies be made in those areas of its programme that could be dealt with by other United Nations bodies. Staff and administrative expenditure should be progressively reduced. For the remaining life of the organization, increased emphasis should be placed on programmes that will assist governments in establishing their own child welfare and health services.

Ottawa, March 18, 1952

ATTENTION: Mr. Morley Scott, United Nations Division

This will acknowledge your letter of March 13+ requesting comments on the letter and memorandum which you received from the Department of Finance regarding the 1952 contribution for UNICEF.† I should like to comment under three headings.

(1) The nature of the UNICEF operations and the suggestion that the work of the Fund is duplicated by other agencies

The suggestion is made that the work of the Fund is another form of technical assistance and therefore duplicates the work of other agencies. With the reduction in mass feeding and the instructions from the Assembly to place greater emphasis on long-range needs and on underdeveloped areas, many of the programmes follow the technical assistance pattern, but it is technical assistance "with a difference". UNICEF has always been a supply organization and therefore can undertake many programmes involving supplies from which the rules of technical assistance bar the other agencies. It has been made abundantly clear that recipient countries are prevented from undertaking certain projects if supplies are not included in the international assistance. For example, the mass campaigns against tuberculosis and against yaws would have been impossible had UNICEF not been able to supply the BCG vaccine and the penicillin to carry them out. The beneficiaries could carry local expenses for these programmes, but had no funds with which to import the necessary equipment and supplies.

The comments regarding overlapping overlook the fact that where professional personnel are required in any of these programmes, UNICEF secures these from the United Nations or appropriate specialized agencies such as WHO or FAO. Technical approval for the programmes is also secured in advance from these agencies. Canada, it is true, has had reservations about the support given to the International Children's Centre in Paris and to certain of the capital investment projects. These reservations have not been because of the projects themselves, but because of doubts as to whether they were appropriate for an organization such as UNICEF. These are not, however, types of programmes which are increasing at the present time.

The question is also raised about UNICEF funds being voted to emergency programmes such as those for Palestine or Korean refugees where other U.N. bodies have responsibility. It should be pointed out that the Children's Fund Board have on each occasion expressed the view that the other organs set up to deal with these emergencies should do so, but because the member nations had failed to contribute sufficient funds to begin or continue the programmes, great pressure was being put on all U.N. agencies to do what they could to meet very critical conditions. The need was apparent, and with funds lacking from elsewhere, it would have been very difficult for UNICEF to refuse while it had money available. As the Fund has an efficient supply organization which has demonstrated that it can deliver supplies more quickly than many governments can do, it is understandable that they are expected to play their part in these international programmes.

In recent disasters such as the Italian floods and the volcano eruption and typhoon in the Philippines, UNICEF was appealed to again because they could deliver supplies more quickly than most agencies or governments, and their contribution was for the very early stages of relief before the governments themselves and other agencies could take over.

(2) The matter of administrative expenditures and staff reductions

Considerable stress is laid by the Department of Finance on the fact that reductions in staff and administrative costs have not kept pace with the reductions in the annual budget. While this is always a matter of concern in international organizations, there are certain factors to be taken into account. While there have been some reductions in staff, the type of programme which the Fund has been instructed to undertake in recent years is a much more expensive one to administer than mass feeding operations confined to one continent. When the whole world becomes the constituency, travel costs mount and staff must be spread in various areas. As far as the European office is concerned, while the European programmes have been very much reduced, that office has been given the responsibility for the whole Mediterranean area as well. This includes North Africa and the Middle East including Palestine refugee programmes.

Administrative costs cannot be accurately measured against the contributions to the Fund in any one year. Many of the previously approved programmes require several years to complete and staff must therefore be available to deal with many programmes which do not appear in the allocations for 1951.

The Executive Director, Mr. Pate, has always been insistent that the maximum amount of money must be devoted to programmes and the minimum to staff.

(3) The size and nature of the Canadian contribution

It has been suggested that the contribution for 1952 should be reduced in order to indicate that the Canadian Government considers this a temporary organization. The Canadian Delegation in 1950 voted to continue UNICEF until 1953. The whole question will come up for discussion at that time and presumably the Canadian position will be governed by the considerations in 1953, and we shall be free to take any position that seems appropriate at that time. It would, in my opinion, be unfortunate to commit ourselves so far in advance. To maintain our contribution at last year's figure will in no way imply that we have decided to support the continuation of the Fund beyond 1953. That was also made clear in the 1951 Assembly debate. Other countries are also maintaining this freedom and at the same time proposing to continue their contributions to the Fund without reduction. The amount of money involved is not large and I would personally regret to see us reduce the figure from last year.

The Canadian contribution has always been spent in Canada and there is no reason why this should not continue. The suggestions regarding the purchase of possible surpluses seems confusing. If we had a specific surplus which could be utilized in the Fund's programmes, as has happened in the past, there might be a reason for suggesting the use of part of the contribution for this. However, to offer a contribution, part of which is tied to a purely hypothetical surplus, would make it extremely difficult for the Board to plan utilization of the Canadian contribution. There is no suggestion of a date at which this restriction might be lifted if no surplus becomes available, and again in view of the limited amount of money involved it would appear to put Canada in a rather unnecessarily embarrassing position. The Fund has always been co-operative in its Canadian purchases, which are made through the Canadian Commercial Corporation, and the point raised in the memorandum from the Department of Finance as to the inconsistency between urging long-range programmes and insisting at the same time on the use of surpluses which hardly fit into this, would seem to be well taken.

The Programme Committee of UNICEF meets on April 14, and the Executive Board on April 21. There is always more interest, and to be quite practical, more credit for a contribution announced at the time of Fund meetings. If it is possible to make such an announcement in April, it would be very much appreciated, and might also be an incentive in other quarters. In the past the Canadian delegate has on occasion been authorized to announce that the Cabinet was recommending the contribution to Parliament. It is understood that the final vote will not have taken place at the time of the meetings.

CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa,] April 4, 1952

PRINCIPLES GOVERNING VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTIONS TO UNITED NATIONS AGENCIES

1. My memorandum to the Under-Secretary of March 22,<sup>130</sup> on this subject, outlined a difference of opinion, involving questions of principle, which had developed between this department and the Department of Finance over our 1952 contribution to UNRWAPR.

2. More recently, a somewhat similar problem has come to a head in connection with our 1952 contribution to UNICEF. In this case too, a recommendation approved by our Minister was sent to Finance for comments. Finance's reply suggests a change in the amount of the contribution which is not in itself too significant, $400,000 instead of $500,000. Dr. Clark's letter, however, and a long memorandum which it enclosed, raise policy questions which are more important. Mrs. Sinclair of Health and Welfare and we in this Division think Finance's views unacceptable, and we also consider that some of them are of the sort that Finance should not offer or are not qualified to offer. The details of the story will be set down in a separate memorandum soon.<sup>131</sup>

3. There must certainly be more conversation with Finance about the UNRWAPR-UNICEF contributions. The signs are that they will be sticky about it, and my regretful conclusion is that we must be too. May I ask you to decide how you would like this difficulty to be handled? It could perhaps be unstuck a bit at your level in conversation, and then we could have an inter-departmental meeting. Or we could move at once to an inter-departmental meeting. I should be a little scared that an ungreased meeting might tighten the jam. As an un-close second best to your preliminary approach, I could have a jaw with Deutsch.

4. The meeting would perhaps be:

Finance — Deutsch, with Pollock and Stone

External — Reid, United Nations, Economic, and European Divisions

Health & Welfare — Davidson, with Sinclair. (I propose Davidson because Sinclair might be regarded as unduly influenced by her UNICEF post. Also an extra gun.)

5. The matter is perhaps not so urgent but that the meeting (if it is to occur) might be held in the week of April 14. This will give both yourself and United Nations Division a chance to catch up on our back-logs, caused by policy meetings.

Memorandum from United Nations Division to Acting Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

[Ottawa,] April 21, 1952

VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTIONS TO U.N. AGENCIES — UNICEF

On my memorandum to you of April 4, 1952, you pencilled the question "Would it not be possible to agree on $400,00 and not have an argument, while reserving, our position?" Before I give you my views on this question, I think I had better let you have a more detailed statement of the present position with respect to our 1952 contribution to UNICEF.

2. On February 1, 1952, Mr. Heeney signed a letter to the Deputy Minister of Finance informing him that our Minister was prepared to recommend to Cabinet that the Canadian government make a contribution for 1952 of $500,000, the same amount as was contributed for 1951. The contribution would be made up of $300,000 in cash, earmarked for UNICEF purchases in would it not be possible to agree on $400,000 and not have an argument, while reserving our position. E. R[eid] Apr. 9/52

Canada, and $200,000 earmarked for the purchase of some specific Canadian product in surplus supply. (I might remark in passing that this proviso was originally suggested not because we thought it was a good idea but because we believed it would make the suggested contribution more palatable to Finance. We were wrong, as you will see.)

3. On February 26, Dr. Clark sent us a reply and enclosed a long memorandum prepared for him by Frank Stone. The letter and memorandum made a number of points:

(a) Canada had had serious doubts about the continuation of UNICEF past 1950, and certainly did not want it continued after the end of 1953, the date to which its present lease on life from the General Assembly runs. UNICEF was an emergency program and an emergency program should not be allowed to continue indefinitely.

(b) UNICEF duplicates activities that are, or could be, carried out by other U.N. agencies such as WHO, FAO or Technical Assistance.

(c) The level of administrative costs in UNICEF is disproportionately high.

(d) There are some parts of UNICEF's present program which we do not like and have expressed doubts about.

(e) Total contributions to UNICEF have been decreasing sharply since 1949.

(f) Because Canada has questioned the parts of UNICEF's program in which surplus Canadian products would probably be used, our contribution should not be rigidly tied to purchases of this kind.

4. Dr. Clark's letter recommended a contribution of only $400,000 for 1952, and said in part "Contributions on a decreasing scale ... would indicate clearly that contributing countries are looking to the contraction and eventual winding up of this organization."

5. The concluding two paragraphs of Mr. Stone's memorandum, which suggest a statement which might be delivered when the Canadian contribution is made, may also be quoted:

"In transmitting its 1952 contribution, Canada should remind the Director-General of Canadian doubts about the need for continuing UNICEF permanently. Attention should be drawn to the fact that most aspects of the UNICEF program are now being, or could be, carried out by other United Nations bodies to which Canada is contributing in increasing amounts."

The Canadian representative on the UNICEF Executive Board should ask that any necessary economies be made in those areas of its program that could be dealt with by other United Nations bodies. Staff and administrative expenditure should be progressively reduced. For the remaining life of the organization, increased emphasis should be placed on programs that will assist governments in establishing their own child welfare and health services."

6. Dr. Clark's letter and its enclosed memorandum were referred to Health and Welfare for comments. Mrs. Sinclair replied on March 18, 1952. She answered all the points made in the communication from Finance, concluding with the strong recommendation that the 1952 contribution be of the same size as the 1951 contribution, i.e. $500,000.

7. Rather than summarize Mrs. Sinclair's letter, and then give this division's views, I shall simply give you briefly the case for a continued contribution of $500,000 and against the Finance arguments; our views and Health and Welfare's are substantially the same. The following subparagraphs are lettered to correspond with the sub-paragraphs under paragraph 3 above.

(a) It is true that Canada had some doubts about UNICEF's continuation, but Canada nevertheless voted with the majority to continue the agency in existence until the end of 1953. It would be a little inconsistent to start winding it up on our own now. We also voted at the recent Session of the Assembly — while reserving our position on Canada's contribution — for a resolution calling on member governments to contribute generously to UNICEF this year. (Mr. Johnson believed that Mrs. Marshall<sup>132</sup> had obtained Mr. Abbott's concurrence before casting this vote; I do not know whether this can be verified. Mr. Abbott was in Paris at the time.)

(b) It may well be true that other U.N. agencies could, and probably should, take over UNICEF's activities. It is not true, however, that there is at present any significant amount of duplication. It would be very difficult, politically, to justify a decreased contribution on these grounds, when neither we nor the U.N. have made any provision for all or any of UNICEF's work to be taken over by other agencies.

(c) It may be true that the level of administrative costs is unreasonably high, although Mrs. Sinclair takes issue with this statement. But since UNICEF has no mandate from the U.N. to "dwindle itself away", dwindling contributions from governments are likely to aggravate rather than improve the situation, whatever exhortations go with them.

(d) It may also be true that parts of UNICEF's present program are of doubtful value. We would, however, be on very shaky ground if we used this as an excuse for a decreased contribution, since we certainly have not taken advantage of past opportunities to make such views known. At the recent Assembly, Mrs. Marshall, while giving loud praise to UNICEF generally, said only one thing which might even be interpreted as criticism: while it appeared appropriate to assist countries to install milk-drying or pasteurizing equipment, it was doubtful in Canada's view whether other forms of capital investment with UNICEF funds would be quite so appropriate.

(e) It is not wholly accurate to imply that contributions from other governments generally have been decreasing since 1949. The large cut in contributions which has occurred since that date has been the single-handed achievement of the United States House Appropriations Committee, in direct opposition to the wishes both of the Senate and of the United States Administration. Other important contributors have maintained or increased their contributions. Pledges for 1952 from other major contributors are in almost every case equal to or greater than their contributions for 1951. The United States Administration has asked Congress to approve increased contributions for both 1952 and 1953.

Mrs. R.J. Marshall, Representative, Delegation to the Sixth Session of the General Assembly.

(f) Health and Welfare agrees with Finance that our 1952 contribution to UNICEF should not be tied to purchases in Canada, or earmarked for surplus Canadian products; the chances are that the funds would be spent in Canada, as they have been in the past, even if no strings were attached to them.

8. Our main objection to Finance's thesis is that it is not appropriate for the Spring of 1952. Their arguments should either have been advanced in 1950, before the decision was taken on UNICEF's continuation until the end of 1953, or should not be voiced until the General Assembly is discussing its further continuation at the 1953 session. I would agree with Finance to this extent: if a motion for the winding up of UNICEF were now in order, and if Health and Welfare were satisfied with the concomitant arrangements for the taking over of UNICEF's work by other agencies, I should be inclined to support that motion simply on the grounds that one agency in any field is better than two. But the winding up of UNICEF is not going to be discussed internationally until the Assembly meets in 1953, and at the moment we have no idea what proposals will be made then for its continuation or, conversely, what arrangements will be suggested for transferring its functions to other agencies. Certainly adequate provision, including financial provision, will have to be made for the transfer of UNICEF's functions; in view of the strong emotional appeal of an agency which looks after children, anything less would be politically impossible.

9. Finally we must take into account the very strong probability that UNICEF will continue in some form or other, after 1953, in spite of whatever objections we may make. In that case, of course, no provision would be made for transferring UNICEF's work to other agencies, and it would be politically difficult if not impossible for us to refuse to support its work. It would be embarrassing if we had reduced our contributions in 1952 and again in 1953, and then had to reinstate them.

10. Now to return to your question. I do not think it would be possible for us both to agree on $500,000 and to "reserve our position", as you put it, vis à vis Finance. The points of principle, as I see it, are more important than the $100,000 and are inextricably tied up with it. Finance is asking us to accept a policy decision which is of doubtful wisdom, and which is in any case premature. It seems to me that if we accept the cut in our contribution, we must accept the reasoning on which the cut is based. If we accept the cut, but not the reasoning, we would seem to be putting our Minister in the position of having to defend a move which is very apt to be politically unpopular, and giving him no arguments to defend it with. It is not as though Finance were maintaining that Canada could not afford $500,000 but could afford $400,000. In that case, of course, there could be no argument with Finance's decision.

11. Two obvious courses are open to us. On the one hand, we can accept Finance's arguments, or as many of them as are necessary to provide some sort of a case for the Minister, and ask him to seek, with the concurrence of the Minister of Finance, Cabinet's approval for a contribution of $400,000. In that case, he and Mr. Abbott may have to contend with Mr. Martin. On the other hand, we can suggest to the Minister that he recommend $500,000 to Cabinet, letting him know the objections he may expect to receive from Mr. Abbott and our suggested answers to them.

12. These alternatives amount to (a) a complete or near-complete capitulation to Finance, or (b) carrying an interdepartmental disagreement to Cabinet. What I do not recommend is that we should continue arguing the question on an interdepartmental level. This would take up more time, probably to no avail. And unless a Cabinet decision can be reached by early May, before the next supplementaries are printed, the chances are that there will be no Canadian contribution at all.

13. What perhaps distresses me most about this prickly pair of alternatives is that the decision to fight or not to fight should rest with External. UNICEF is, after all, a Health and Welfare matter, even if Canada's contribution to it is included, and perhaps must remain, in External's estimates. It is my belief that UNICEF should be, like WHO, almost entirely a Health and Welfare problem, with all initiative in connection with it left to that department. In the future, with your concurrence, it will be my endeavour to bring UNICEF into that position.

14. For the present problem, I recommend that the decision be left to Health and Welfare. We know that Health and Welfare disagrees with Finance. We do not know whether Mr. Martin would be prepared to support his department's case against Mr. Abbott in Cabinet. If he feels strongly enough about it to do so, I would recommend that our Minister support him; I think Health and Welfare's side of the argument is the right one. If he does not, then I think both our departments should concur as quickly as possible in Finance's recommendation.

15. If you agree with the foregoing, you may also agree that the best procedure would be to ask Dr. Davidson<sup>133</sup> to put the question to his Minister. If you prefer, I could telephone Dr. Davidson myself. Or you may consider that since Mr. Pearson had tentatively approved a contribution of $500,000 he should be informed of the present difficulties. If so, I can have the necessary memorandum prepared.

16. To summarize, my recommendation is that we either (a) ask Dr. Davidson to ask his Minister whether he is prepared to recommend a contribution of $500,000 to Cabinet over Finance's objections, and base our advice to Mr. Pearson on the answer Mr. Martin gives, or (b) inform our Minister of the present difficulties and recommend that his position be determined by whether or not Mr. Martin is prepared to carry the disagreement to Cabinet.

CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO UNICEF FOR 1952

I attach a Memorandum to Cabinet for your signature and subsequent Cabinet distribution recommending a Canadian contribution of $500,000 for 1952.†

2. The question of this contribution has been discussed with officials of the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Department of Finance.

3. The attached text has the approval of the Deputy Minister of National Health and Welfare who has suggested some of the wording.

4. The text does not have the express approval of Finance but I think we do not need to be too apprehensive in this regard. An earlier formulation of this memorandum was sent to the Deputy Minister of Finance for comment. He suggested that the figure of the proposed contribution should be $400,000 rather than $500,000 and that the reduction should be publicly explained as an earnest of the Canadian Government's view that UNICEF should go out of business after 1953 and that its operations should be on a diminishing scale until that time.

5. This proposal did not find favour with officials of this Department or of National Health and Welfare. Consequently an interdepartmental meeting was held in my office which Mr. Deutsch of Finance and Mrs. Sinclair of National Health and Welfare attended. It was pointed out to Mr. Deutsch that:

(a) Although UNICEF's present lease on life has been extended only to the end of 1953 we have no assurance that the General Assembly will not decide to continue it thereafter;

(b) Even if UNICEF disappears as a separate agency its functions would have to be continued by other appropriate organizations which would require extra money to shoulder this extra responsibility. Mr. Deutsch fully agreed with this and would be prepared to see our contributions to W.H.O., F.A.O., Technical Assistance, etc., be proportionately increased;

(c) In any case, UNICEF was going ahead full steam with its programme in 1952 and operations are not being reduced. Other contributing countries have not been reducing contributions;

(d) The place and time to make known and effective the Canadian view on UNICEF are at the General Assembly in 1953 and not at this present moment.

6. Mr. Deutsch felt the weight of these considerations and, although he was not entirely convinced, I had the impression that he would advise his Minister not to insist on the lower figure of $400,000 in Cabinet.

7. We had suggested to the Deputy Minister of Welfare that the recommendation to Cabinet should stand in your name "with the concurrence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare." Dr. Davidson did not wish to ask Mr. Martin to be thus formally associated with the recommendation although he was sure that Mr. Martin would, in fact, support it in Cabinet.

8. I have not thought it suitable to include in this Memorandum to Cabinet any specific suggestions as to how and by whom the functions of UNICEF should be carried on after 1953 but I think that we should begin to determine policy in this regard in order to take a consistent line in the various U.N. bodies and specialized agencies which would be involved.

UNICEF; CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION, 1952

45. The Secretary of State for External Affairs put forward a proposal that, subject to certain conditions, provision be made in the Supplementary Estimates for 1952-53 for a contribution of $500,000 to the United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund for the agency's financial year 1952. This was the amount Canada had contributed for 1951. The U.S. government was asking Congress to approve a U.S. contribution of $12 million towards the Fund's budget of $20 million for 1952.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

46. The Minister of National Revenue wondered if it would not be more appropriate for the World Health Organization to undertake the projects designed to aid governments in establishing national health and welfare services presently being carried out by UNICEF.

47. Mr. Pearson said UNICEF was working in close collaboration with the World Health Organization and other U.N. agencies but had distinct functions and was not duplicating the work of WHO. As it had been established as an emergency organization and extended only until the end of 1953, the question of its future would go before the General Assembly in that year. He felt Canada should adopt the position that UNICEF's functions should be taken over by WHO and other appropriate agencies but this was likely to be opposed by the poorer countries.

48. The Prime Minister considered there was a danger that too many agencies were operating in the same general field. Canadian policy should be to press for other U.N. agencies to absorb UNICEF's functions. The Minister of Finance had indicated to him that he would not oppose the proposed 1952 contribution.

49. The Cabinet, after further discussion, approved the recommendation of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and agreed that:

(a) provision be made in the Supplementary Estimates for 1952-53 for a $500,000 contribution to the United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund for that agency's financial year 1952;

(b) in pledging this contribution it should be made clear that it did not commit Canada to support the continuation of UNICEF after 1953 as a separate agency;

(c) the Executive Director of UNICEF be asked to use the contribution for purchases in Canada and, to the extent appropriate to the agency's programme, to give due attention to any suitable Canadian commodities in surplus supply; and,

(d) Canadian representatives at future meetings of U.N. bodies concerned with UNICEF continue to stress the need for keeping UNICEF administrative expenditures to a minimum.

MEMORANDUM FOR MR. LÉGER

UNICEF PURCHASE OF CANADIAN SKIM MILK

Yesterday Mrs. D.B. Sinclair of the Department of National Health and Welfare telephoned Mr. Stephens to say that Mr. Pate, Director of UNICEF, had given her the information on the telephone that UNICEF intended to purchase $525,000 worth of skim milk in Canada.

2. This purchase is in addition to the large amount now being sold to UNICEF, which was ordered last year.

3. Mr. Pate was interested to learn as soon as possible whether Canada would be contributing this year to UNICEF and, if so, how much. If there is to be a contribution, Mr. Pate would arrange his financial operations so that those Canadian dollars would be applied to the Canadian purchase. Otherwise, payment would be made from U.S. dollar funds that UNICEF has on hand.

4. Parenthetically, it is rather pleasant to see some direct financial return to the Canadian economy for taxpayers' money donated to international organizations. UNICEF, I believe, has always spent as much, or more, in Canada than it has received from the Canadian Government.<sup>134</sup>

5. Mr. Gordon Robertson says that Cabinet on May 28 approved a Canadian contribution to UNICEF of $500,000.

6. Mrs. Sinclair would like to be able to telephone Mr. Pate to inform him that the Government has decided to ask Parliament for $500,000 and that, in the normal course of events, this figure will probably stand. I think this Department might tell Mrs. Sinclair to go ahead. Mr. Gordon Robertson agrees this might be done. Mr. Pate should, of course, be requested to keep this information private until an announcement is made in Canada.<sup>135</sup>

7. Do you agree?<sup>136</sup>

October Meetings

The October meetings of the Executive Board of UNICEF were held just before the opening of the General Assembly. The main business was the approval of allocations to provide supplies and equipment for forty-two long range children's programmes in thirty countries and territories, and in addition, emergency aid for three countries and for Palestine refugee mothers and children. About two-thirds of the money voted for programmes was for maternal and child welfare services and training, chiefly in rural areas, which reflects an increasing emphasis on this type of programme. The other programmes were chiefly for mass health campaigns or for milk conservation. The administrative costs for 1953 were also allocated. The total expenditures amounted to $7,154,000, which left the Fund with an unallocated balance of $899,000. There is in addition approximately $1 1/2 million remaining from earlier allocations to China which is at present not being used.

There was considerable discussion as to whether it was desirable that UNICEF should be added to the responsibilities of the Negotiating Committee of the General Assembly. Canada had some doubts as to the wisdom of such a step at this time, but the Board as a whole approved the idea. The Fifth Committee and the General Assembly have recently added UNICEF to the agencies for which the Negotiating Committee is responsible, with the understanding that the administration may still continue its own efforts to add to UNICEF's resources.

Future of UNICEF

The General Assembly will consider the future of UNICEF at its 1953 session but there was a certain amount of informal discussion on the subject at the recent meetings. No governments have as yet taken a firm position and therefore it is only possible to ascertain trends. Most of the underdeveloped countries are anxious, for obvious reasons, that the work should be allowed to continue. There was no evidence at this time of efforts to make the Fund permanent, but delegates such as the United States and Australia (the two largest contributors) seem to feel that there was little likelihood that the Fund's existence would be terminated at the end of 1953 by any action of the Assembly. The United States, having lost its battle in 1950, does not appear anxious to be voting alone in 1953 and will presumably be looking for some formula which will be generally acceptable. The inclusion of UNICEF in the Negotiating Committee agencies may give it a certain status, and it seems probable that in 1953 the decision will be not whether work for children will continue under U.N. auspices, but what form it should take. The sort of questions which are being raised by delegates are whether the Fund should be given a further extension of life for a definite period, such as three years or five years, or whether it should be permitted to continue as long as it can secure funds and find suitable programmes on which to spend them, or whether it should continue indefinitely until such time as the Assembly decides to review its status.

The Canadian question as to whether the work might not be done by the various specialized agencies, providing their terms of reference were appropriately modified and their funds increased, did not seem to meet with great response among the delegates to whom it was put. They had not however any instructions from their governments on this point. Relations with the specialized agencies are at the present time good and there is no outward evidence that they are working actively for such a change. They are, however, becoming increasingly aware of the importance of supplies if many of their programmes are to be effective, and if this trend continues, they might at some future time be in a position to absorb the work of UNICEF.

Certain points would have to be considered in adopting a position that the work of the Fund should be transferred to appropriate specialized agencies. In the first place, it would probably mean that no funds would be available for some of the emergency situations in which UNICEF can assist at the present time. The present target budget of $20 millions a year includes about fourteen per cent for emergency supplies. The main argument for transferring the work to other agencies is that it reduces the number of agencies and the administrative costs. At the present time, UNICEF administrative costs are approximately $2 millions a year.<sup>137</sup> This is about ten per cent of the $20 millions target budget and is not an unreasonable figure.<sup>138</sup> However, the services cannot be very much reduced, even if the Fund failed to secure its full objective of $20 millions. If that happens, the percentage for administrative costs would, of course be higher. The specialized agencies could not take over the work of UNICEF without increasing their own administrative costs to some extent and therefore the full $2 millions could not be saved. Against the possible saving would have to be weighed the question of whether the specialized agencies could secure the additional operating funds which would enable them to provide the supplies and equipment now being given by UNICEF. If they could not, the net result would probably be that for the sake of saving something considerably less than $2 millions, a useful part of the U.N.'s work would be eliminated. Any country advocating the absorption of UNICEF's work by other agencies on the ground of administrative economy could only do so effectively if at the same time they stated that they were willing to increase their contributions to the specialized agencies to a figure which would make it possible for them to maintain UNICEF programmes.

No one to date seems to have suggested that the work itself is not of considerable value. Further discussions will probably centre on the best ways of continuing programmes which provide supplies as well as technical assistance.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT FUND

On January 12, 1952, the General Assembly adopted a resolution jointly sponsored by Chile, Cuba, Burma, Egypt and Yugoslavia which requests the Economic and Social Council to devise and submit to the next session of the General Assembly a plan for establishing, as soon as circumstances permit, a special fund for grants-in-aid and low-interest, long-term loans to under-developed countries in order to accelerate their economic development.

2. The resolution was approved by a vote of 30 in favour, 16 against, and 11 abstentions including the Soviet bloc. It received the support of almost all Latin American, Middle Eastern and South and South-east Asian countries. It was opposed by the United States, the United Kingdom, Canada and several other Commonwealth countries, and most of the Western European countries.

3. While expressing full agreement with the ultimate purpose — the economic improvement of under-developed countries — the Canadian delegation opposed the resolution mainly on the stated grounds that the defence obligations assumed by the Government of Canada made it impossible for it to contemplate at present opening up a broad new field of assistance to under-developed countries. Furthermore, Canada had serious doubts as to whether the new proposal would in practice be the best means of promoting economic development in present circumstances. In the absence of any support for the resolution from other prospective contributing countries, we believed that there would be a very serious danger that the adoption of the plan in such unpropitious circumstances would raise false hopes and cause misunderstandings among the peoples of advanced and under-developed countries alike.<sup>139</sup>

FINANCING ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

An interdepartmental meeting was held yesterday afternoon to discuss the position which the Canadian Delegation to ECOSOC should take on the subject of the financing of economic development. Finance, the Bank, Trade and Commerce, Defence Production and Labour were represented at the meeting.

2. The two principal proposals coming before ECOSOC are the establishment of an International Finance Corporation and the formulation of plans for an international development fund to be established later. A report on the proposed International Finance Corporation has been drawn up by the staff of the International Bank and transmitted by the Board of Directors of the Bank to the Secretary-General for discussion at ECOSOC. The letter of transmittal makes it clear that the Directors of the Bank are not committing their governments to approval of the proposal.

3. Officials of the Bank of Canada and the Department of Finance have examined the International Bank report and were able to inform the meeting yesterday that they were prepared to recommend support of the new institution, provided it is set up as recommended in the International Bank report.

4. The primary purpose of the International Finance Corporation would be to stimulate private investment and to that end it would itself engage in equity investment and loans for non-self-liquidating projects. It would operate as an affiliate of the Bank and its capital would be subscribed by member governments on the same scale as subscriptions to the Bank. It is suggested that its total capitalization be $400 million and that one-third of the subscription be paid up at the beginning, with the other two-thirds on call. Canada's subscription on this basis would be about $15 million, of which about $5 million would be paid into the Corporation at the beginning.

5. It was agreed at the meeting that the ECOSOC Delegation should be authorized to support the idea of an International Finance Corporation.

See United Nations, Official Records for the General Assembly, Sixth Session, Plenary Meetings, 360th Meeting, January 12, 1952, p. 332.

However, since such support would entail a specific financial commitment, should the Finance Corporation be established, it was agreed that Cabinet approval should be sought before the Delegation gave its support to the plan.

6. The meeting then turned to a consideration of the Canadian position in regard to the General Assembly resolution calling upon ECOSOC to formulate plans for an international development fund. This Department's position was outlined by Plumptre in the terms agreed upon with you yesterday morning. There was unanimous agreement that the Delegation should (a) participate in the Council's discussion and drafting of recommendations to the Assembly, (b) explain at the outset that such participation does not in any way indicate a change of policy in favour of economic aid through the U.N., and that the Government has no present intention of making a contribution to any fund which might be established, (c) make clear that our attitude, as expressed in (b), is not a transitory one, dependent upon defence expenditures, and that a reduction in such defence expenditures would not change our basic position, (d) be as helpful as possible in drawing up plans for the structure and organization of an international development fund but refrain from taking any part in discussions of the financial aspects of the fund, such as the size, the kind and sources of contributions, etc, (e) emphasize the inevitability of weighted voting in any fund.

7. The suggestion that Canada might put forward an alternative proposal for an advisory board with weighted voting met with a generally negative response at the meeting. The other Departments appreciated the objective we had in mind but found little to recommend the advisory board suggestion. Rasminsky and Deutsch took the lead in this discussion but it was clear from the occasional comment that the others shared their views. The proposal was, of course, a new one to those present and they indicated their willingness to give further thought to the matter. As the discussion continued, however, their positions obviously became firm and there is no reason to suppose that further consideration would make them more sympathetic to the scheme.

8. The arguments put forward against the suggestion ran along the following lines:

(a) It was very doubtful whether such a proposal would, in fact, help toward the political objective External Affairs had in mind. The under-developed countries want money, not advice. They would get nothing from an advisory board. It would have no money to give and any function it might perform in the way of research or help in assessing needs was already available to them through existing machinery.

(b) While weighted voting would help to reduce irresponsible recommendations, it would mean (on the basis of the system used in the Bank) that the U.S., U.K. and Canada could obstruct any proposal or recommendation. The under-developed countries would, therefore, have no real voice even in an advisory board; their influence, indeed, would be less here than in ECOSOC. One official at the meeting expressed this thought by saying that whereas the under-developed countries are pressing for a fund "we are offering them a body to go to which has no money and in which, in any event, they have no voice."

(c) Since weighted voting would give a form of veto to the developed countries, the clash of interests, which we are anxious to soften, might well be sharpened in an advisory body.

(d) If the recommendations from the advisory body to the governments engaged in foreign aid programmes were critical of what was being done or urged substantial changes in division of aid or purposes for which assistance was being given, it seemed most unlikely that governments would in fact act on such advice.

(e) The possibility of Soviet membership on the advisory board would have to be considered. It was suggested that a way around this would be to limit eligibility for membership on the advisory board to countries members of the International Bank. It was agreed that this might be a way out but, with the same membership and the same scale of weighted voting, it would mean in effect ending up with the same membership (countrywise) as the Board of Directors of the Bank. It would be difficult to prove the need of a second almost identical body to act solely in the capacity of an advisory board. Another suggestion was that the Board of Directors of the Bank might itself act as the U.N. advisory board on economic development but it was agreed that this would create embarrassment for the Bank and would probably not be acceptable to it.

(f) If the under-developed countries were to regard this proposal as useless from their point of view, they might well look upon it as a dodge to divert their efforts from their real goal. In that event, more harm than good would be done in the field of politics.

(g) On the other hand, the under-developed countries might take the proposal seriously if they looked upon it as a half-way house toward their objective of a fund. On that score, officials saw certain dangers for us in initiating such a proposal. They thought that if the board were actually set up it would be bound to develop in a short time into an agency which would try to stimulate greater flow of capital as well as give advice on request. We might well find it embarrassing to resist the prodding tactics of the board, especially if we had initiated it.

(h) The under-developed countries might even regard this advisory authority as a temporary measure and a first step toward their fund. If they were to interpret our proposal as a move in their direction from which the final step to a fund would be shorter and therefore easier to take, then it would be even harder to hold back later on and would cause even more resentment if we did.

(i) So far, the system of weighted voting has been used only in the Bank and the Fund, organs responsible for large-scale financial operations. In the U.N. context, weighted voting has become associated with financial operations. The under-developed countries might well think that money is in the offing since weighted voting and advice have never gone together in the U.N. Indeed, it would be difficult to justify the contention that, for example, U.S. advice is ten times better than Canadian advice.

9. The consensus of the other Departments present at the meeting was that we would gain more with the under-developed countries and would safe-guard our own position better by moving towards them on a basis of practical and clearly useful schemes for economic development, than by offering them something which they might look upon either as a palpable dodge or as a stick to beat us with. We shall be in a happier position at this Council session than previously, since we will, subject to Cabinet approval, be able to support the new International Finance Corporation, we will be able to report increased support of the Bank, and we will be able to point to a second Colombo Plan contribution.

10. It was agreed that there would be no objection to a proposal that ECOSOC should undertake an annual review of all economic aid programmes for development of under-developed countries. A survey prepared by the Secretary-General would provide a complete picture of what is being done and what gaps need to be filled. This would not, of course, help to satisfy the demands of the under-developed countries for a U.N. fund, but it would give ECOSOC an opportunity to examine and comment on bilateral programmes and it might have a good effect in showing clearly the extent of the aid being given.

11. I think it is quite clear that there is nothing to be gained by further consultation on the official level with respect to the proposal for an advisory board. Would you now indicate, therefore, whether you wish to discuss the proposal with Mr. Abbott, or would like to have it put before Cabinet formally as part of the memorandum which will be going forward with the instructions to the Delegation on economic development, or whether there is any other action which you would prefer to take.<sup>140</sup>

INSTRUCTIONS TO THE CANADIAN DELEGATION TO THE FOURTEENTH SESSION OF THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL
NEW YORK — MAY 20-AUGUST 1, 1952

International Development Fund

At the Sixth Session of the General Assembly, the under-developed countries were successful in having a resolution adopted calling upon the Economic and Social Council to draw up a detailed plan for establishing, as soon as circumstances permit, a special fund for grants-in-aid and for low-interest, long-term loans to under-developed countries to assist in their economic development. This resolution was passed against the strong opposition of all the more economically advanced countries, including Canada.

2. Although ECOSOC's responsibility, under the Assembly's resolution, is limited to the drafting of plans, the Delegation will have to exercise care in dealing with this item. It is necessary, on the one hand, to take all practicable steps to avoid widening the gap which has already developed over this issue between the poorer and the richer countries in the non-Communist world. The unity of the free world is an important objective of our foreign policy and any issue which tends to weaken that unity must be handled tactfully. On the other hand, this particular goal of the under-developed countries, namely the establishment of an international development fund under the United Nations, is one which Canada does not support and is not likely to support in the foreseeable future.

3. The question to be decided at this time is, therefore, the extent to which the Delegation should participate in the Council's work of carrying out the General Assembly's directive. In a matter of this kind, it is appropriate that the Canadian position should be determined in concert with other countries in a similar situation. It is not desirable that the Canadian Delegation should take the lead in the Council's discussions but provided that other economically advanced countries participate in the drafting of recommendations to the Assembly in respect of a development fund, the Canadian Delegation should also take part. It would be unfortunate if all the countries which are potential contributors were to boycott even discussions of this subject in the Council.

4. It is essential, however, that the participation of the Canadian Delegation should not be interpreted by the under-developed countries as an indication that a Canadian contribution to the fund can be expected if and when it is established. The Canadian Government would not be contributing to an international development fund of this kind. This attitude is based not only on the particular circumstances of today, but also on the conviction that this approach to the problem does not provide a sound or practicable basis for promoting economic development. The Delegation should, therefore, at an early stage in its intervention present a clear picture of the Canadian position. This statement should explain Canada's preference for economic aid on a bilateral basis, our experience in that field and our satisfaction with the results. Bilateral aid suits our methods; we believe that, certainly in present circumstances, it offers a more efficient, practical and useful employment of the resources which we are in a position to make available, than would other types of international machinery.

5. Our present intention is to continue along the path of bilateral aid in respect of grants and to continue our support of United Nations aid to under-developed countries through the International Bank, the International Finance Corporation (which is referred to in detail below), and the United Nations Programmes of Technical Assistance. Further, we would be glad to have ECOSOC undertake, if it so wishes, an annual discussion of international development programmes, both bilateral and multilateral, so that all members of the United Nations may appreciate what is being done and may have an opportunity to make comments. For this purpose the Secretary General might be asked to prepare an annual factual summary of the various programmes.

6. The recommendations which ECOSOC is required to prepare for the General Assembly cover various aspects of the proposed international development fund including the size of the fund, the character and manner of collecting contributions from states, the policies and principles to be followed in regard to grants and loans, and the structure, administration and organization of the fund. The Delegation should not take part in discussing the size of the proposed fund or the nature or source of the contributions to it, but should take part, although not a leading part, in other discussions. In considering the administration of the fund and the organization of any authority which might be set up to control it, the Delegation might well suggest the inevitability or weighted voting, not merely to give contributors their proper voice but also to maintain a balance as between under-developed countries and groups.

7. It may be that the Council will set up a working group or working groups to prepare the first drafts of recommendations. The Delegation should not seek membership on any such group but should not go so far as to refuse, if pressed to accept and if other economically advanced countries accept membership.

8. As noted in paragraph two, the Delegation must exercise special care in dealing with the international development fund because it has become a cause of division between the richer and the poorer countries in the non-Communist world. If, in the course of discussion, it appears that this division is continuing or even being sharpened by the persistent refusal of the richer countries to provide money for the fund and take part in its work, the Canadian Delegation, if it can find a reasonable measure of support from other delegations, should propose consideration of a rather different type of body in which more general and more immediate participation might be possible — a U.N. advisory board on the economic development of under-developed countries. This board would not have any funds directly at its disposal, but all members of the U.N. that were seeking economic aid from other countries or providing such aid to other countries would undertake to consult the board in regard to their international programmes and to give most serious consideration to its recommendations. In order to command the respect and general compliance of the countries concerned, it would be necessary to introduce some form of weighted voting and the most appropriate system of voting and management would seem to be that which has been worked out in the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development; indeed the board would clearly have to maintain close relationship with the Bank and its staff. (It will be noted that the U.S.S.R. and its Satellites are not members of the Bank and for this reason would not and should not qualify for the advantages and responsibilities offered by the advisory board.) The Canadian Government would be willing to submit its economic aid programmes to such an advisory board and to give very serious consideration to its recommendations. If other members of the U.N. could see their way to act in the same manner, a working compromise would emerge between the present positions of the developed and under-developed countries.

ECOSOC; 14TH SESSION; INSTRUCTIONS TO CANADIAN DELEGATION; INTERNATIONAL FINANCE CORPORATION

The Department of Finance has submitted the following memorandum:

"At its Thirteenth Session, the Economic and Social Council adopted a comprehensive resolution on economic development designed to encourage the flow of international investment capital. Following up a proposal for the establishment of an International Finance Corporation which first appeared in a report of the United States International Development Advisory Board (Rockefeller Committee), the Economic and Social Council requested the International Bank to consider whether such an institution could make a significant contribution to economic development over and above those that could be made by existing organizations. The International Bank has now submitted a report in response to this resolution.

Before the war private investment capital played an important role in the economic development of under-developed countries. This has not been true of the post-war period despite the widespread belief that private capital is the most effective means for achieving development over broad sectors of any economy. With the exception of private investment in Canada, and the petroleum industry in several under-developed countries, private foreign investment has been of almost negligible importance. This has been due largely to the numerous uncertainties and risks affecting foreign private investment which have prevailed in capital importing countries.

The failure of private capital to pay its traditional role in economic development has led to numerous proposals of varied scope and merit for the expansion of facilities to provide international public capital. The most ambitious and objectionable of these is the proposal for the creation of an International Development Fund to make free grants to the governments of needy countries. In contrast, the proposal for an International Finance Corporation is of a much more modest and realistic nature, based on sound investment principles and designed mainly to promote economic development through the stimulation of private investment. The Corporation would seek to achieve this by bringing together investment opportunities, capital and experienced management, and by helping to finance private undertakings through equity investments, and through loans without government guarantees. In brief, the proposed Corporation, if it is satisfied regarding the soundness of the project, would together with private enterprise participate in the financing of the enterprise through the purchase of equities or through making of loans without government guarantee. The funds required for these purposes would come initially out of capital subscriptions by members. It is intended that the capital fund would be in the nature of a revolving fund. It is proposed that the equities and other investments acquired should be sold to private investors as opportunities arose. It is proposed all profits made by the Corporation from these operations should inure to the benefit of the governments subscribing to the capital.

These functions are not being carried out at present by the International Bank or any other agency. Experience of the Bank has shown that there is, in fact, a real gap in the present international machinery for financing economic development. Opportunities have arisen in almost all the under-developed countries for profitable and productive undertakings in which private investors are willing to invest but which they cannot finance entirely by themselves. At present their ability to secure the additional funds is limited.

The International Bank is unable to provide greater assistance to the private sector because of two important restrictions in its operations. Firstly, there is the statutory requirement that all Bank loans must be guaranteed by governments. This has had the effect of discouraging potential private borrowers who wish to avoid association with governments in the fear that this would lead to government interference. There have also been instances where governments have been reluctant to give such guarantees to a private undertaking for fear of appearing to favour one private enterprise as against another. Secondly, the International Bank does not engage in equity financing. Lacking equity funds, the Bank has no way of dealing with projects which have good prospects, but which require more equity capital than the private enterpriser is able to put up. The International Finance Corporation would be designed to cover both these gaps in the operations of the International Bank.

The report recommends that the Corporation should start its operations on a modest scale and expand its activities only gradually as it gathered experience.

It is envisaged that the Corporation would be an affiliate of the International Bank, and would operate under the Bank's general supervision. This approach would permit the Corporation to make the fullest use of the technical and administrative staff of the Bank. The Corporation would be able to operate on a much lower administrative budget than would be possible for an independent agency, and there would be no need to set up elaborate and costly new international machinery. Affiliation with the Bank would also enable the Corporation to draw on the practical knowledge and experience of an agency which has proven itself highly competent to deal with the complex problem of financing economic development in a wide variety of countries and enterprises.

Several possible methods are suggested for achieving close affiliation between the Corporation and the Bank. One method would be to have the Executive Directors of the Bank constitute ex officio the Board of Directors of the Corporation, with individual Directors having the same relative voting power in each institution. Another method might be through a management contract. Whichever method is adopted the important thing is to retain the principle of close affiliation so that the management and staff of the Bank can be fully utilized, in the interests of economy and efficiency.

Financially, the Bank and the Corporation would be completely independent. The capital of the Corporation would be provided by its member governments. The report suggests that a total capitalization equivalent to U.S. $400 million would be a reasonable figure. Of this amount one-third would be paid in initially and the balance would be subject to call. Participating members would subscribe to the Corporation in proportion to their subscriptions to the stock of the International Bank. Under such an arrangement Canada would be expected to subscribe roughly $15 million to the stock of the Corporation, of which $5 million would be the initial subscription.

On balance the proposal to establish an International Finance Corporation along the lines suggested in the Bank's report appears to have considerable merit. The following are the principal arguments in favour of establishing a Corporation:

(1) It would fill an important gap in the existing machinery for financing economic development, by making available to private investors some equity capital and also some loan capital without government guarantees.

(2) If successful, it would generate a flow of international private capital far in excess of the modest contribution out of its own resources, by participating financially in private undertakings and by helping to restore confidence.

(3) In the longer run the Corporation would contribute to the improvement of the general climate for private investment both in the creditor and debtor countries. In effect the Corporation would be a pilot operation which, in the course of its activities, would be able to deal in a practical way with the obstacles which stand in the way of private investment.

(4) The Corporation would be operated by an experienced and skilful staff who have demonstrated their ability to operate soundly in the field of foreign investment.

(5) Support for a modest proposal of this kind should make it easier to head off more ambitious, costly and unrealistic proposals such as the International Development Fund.

Instructions to the Canadian Delegation to the Economic and Social Council

If the proposal for the establishment of an International Finance Corporation is regarded favourably by other countries, including the United States and the United Kingdom, the Canadian delegation to the Economic and Social Council may support the proposal, subject to the following conditions:

(1) The Corporation would be an affiliate of the International Bank with substantially the same membership and voting powers as now obtain in the Bank.

(2) The Corporation would not establish new international machinery of an elaborate and costly kind, but would draw on the technical and administrative staff of the Bank.

(3) The total capitalization of the Corporation would be limited to the equivalent of U.S. $400 million to be subscribed by members in proportion to their subscriptions to the stock of the Bank. The Canadian capital subscription should not exceed $15 million with initial paid-in-capital not to exceed $5 million."

ECOSOC; 14TH SESSION; PROPOSED INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT FUND AND INTERNATIONAL FINANCE CORPORATION; INSTRUCTIONS TO DELEGATION<sup>141</sup>

45. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that at the 6th Session of the United Nations General Assembly, despite the opposition of the economically-advanced countries, the under-developed countries had secured adoption of a resolution for an international development fund to provide grants and long-term loans to under-developed countries. While it was necessary to avoid widening the existing gap between the poorer and richer free countries on this issue, the fund was a project Canada was unlikely to support in the foreseeable future.

It was proposed to instruct the Canadian delegation to the 14th Session of the Council, that, provided other advanced countries participated in drafting recommendations for the proposed fund, it should also take part. It should indicate Canada's continued opposition to the scheme, explaining its preference for bilateral economic aid, its intention to continue its support for aid to under-developed countries through various U.N. agencies, and its readiness to take part in an annual discussion of international development programmes in the Council based on a summary of current programmes to be prepared by the Secretary-General. The delegation should not participate in discussions of the size of the proposed fund or the nature or size of contributions. It should not seek, but not refuse, membership in any working groups set up to draft proposals for a fund.

It was also proposed that, if the delegation found the division regarding the fund was continuing or being sharpened it should, if there were sufficient support, propose as an alternative the establishment of a U.N. advisory board on the economic development of under-developed countries. This would not have any funds but all donor and recipient countries would consult it regarding their programmes and undertake to consider its recommendations seriously.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, May 23, 1952 — Cab. Doc. 164-52)

46. The Minister of Finance thought it undesirable for Canada to take the initiative in proposing an advisory board, it would likely provide a means for recipient countries to press for greatly increased aid. It seemed preferable for the delegation to follow the lead of the other donor countries, reassert Canada's opposition to the proposed fund, and explain its intention to continue supporting existing U.N. agencies concerned with aid to under-developed countries.

47. The Prime Minister thought it desirable to defer decision on the question of an advisory board until reports were received as to the trend of the Council's discussions.

48. Mr. Abbott further reported that at its 13th Session, ECOSOC had adopted a resolution on economic development, designed to encourage the flow of international investment capital, which requests the International Bank to consider whether an international finance corporation could make a significant contribution. The Bank had now submitted its report which would be considered by the Council at its 14th Session. The failure of private capital since the war to play its traditional role in economic development had lead to several proposals for the expansion of facilities for providing international public capital, of which that for an international finance corporation was the most realistic. The corporation would seek to stimulate private investment by bringing together investment opportunities, capital and experienced management and helping to finance private undertaking through equity investments and loans without government guarantees. The funds would come initially from capital subscribed by member governments. The Bank's report suggested that a total capitalization of some $400 million would be reasonable. Of this amount, one-third would be paid in initially and the balance would be subject to call, with participating members subscribing to the corporation in proportion to their subscriptions to the stock of the Bank. Canada would be expected to subscribe roughly $15 million to the stock of the Corporation, of which $5 million would be the initial subscription.

The corporation would fill an important gap in existing machinery for financing economic development by making available to private investors some equity capital and some loan capital without government guarantees. He recommended that the Canadian delegation be authorized to support the proposal subject to certain conditions.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Privy Council Office memorandum, May 26, 1952 — Cab. Doc. 163-52)

49. Mr. Pearson expressed agreement with Mr. Abbott's recommendation.

50. The Cabinet, after further discussion, approved the recommendations of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Finance as to instructions to be sent to the Canadian delegation to the 14th Session of the Economic and Social Council with regard to proposals for an international development fund and an international finance corporation, on the understanding that:

(1) a decision on the desirability of the delegation taking the initiative in raising the question of a United Nations advisory board on economic development would be deferred pending reports as to the trend of discussions in the Council on the proposed international development fund;

(2) the delegation should support the proposal for an international finance corporation if it were regarded favourably by other countries, including the United States and the United Kingdom, and subject to the following further conditions:

(a) the corporation would be an affiliate of the International Bank with substantially the membership and voting powers now obtaining in the case of the Bank;

(b) rather than establish elaborate machinery, the corporation would draw on the technical and administrative staff of the Bank;

(c) the corporation's total capitalization would be limited to the equivalent of U.S. $400 million to be subscribed by members in proportion to their subscriptions to the stock of the Bank and the Canadian subscription would not exceed $15 million, initial paid-in capital not to exceed $5 million.

PROGRESS ON THE ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT ITEMS
AT THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL

On Saturday afternoon, June 21, Mr. Deutsch reported to Mr. Lesage on the present position reached in the consideration of these matters at the current session of ECOSOC. The following is a draft summary of his report.

2. Preliminary discussion on the International Finance Corporation and on the Economic Development Fund has taken place in the Council and a vote is expected to be taken shortly on the two proposals. Mr. Deutsch thought it was fortunate that the two subjects had been considered together and that the vote was likely to be taken on both questions about the same time. In that way it has been possible to save time and to put the two proposals into proper relationship with each other.

3. Mr. Deutsch reported that the delegations from the under-developed countries appeared on this occasion to be as conscious as we were that it would be undesirable to sharpen any division between the two groups of countries by unnecessary controversy over these projects. The representatives from the under-developed countries seemed to recognize that nothing would really be gained by attempting to push the United States and ourselves further than we could possibly go. Mr. Deutsch gave the impression that the United Kingdom has been somewhat less astute than usual on this occasion and has gone out of its way to emphasize, even at this stage, its inability to participate in the proposed institutions.

4. In the case of the International Finance Corporation the original U.S. draft resolution has now been modified to permit the International Bank, in its further consideration of the proposal, to go as far as it can carry its member governments with it between now and the next session of the Council. Under this new version of the resolution Mr. Deutsch considers that if the International Bank were to find a sufficient number of countries willing to contribute to the International Finance Corporation it could actually proceed to the establishment of that organization. Consequently, although the resolution does not provide specifically for the establishment of the Corporation it does permit as much progress to be made as circumstances (including the U.S. domestic situation) will allow. The under-developed countries appeared to accept the reasonableness of this resolution and the principal ones have already indicated their willingness to support the resolution when it comes to a vote.

5. In the case of the Economic Development Fund a reasonably satisfactory resolution has also been devised after considerable "negotiation" among the developed countries and between them and the under-developed countries. This resolution in its present form (a copy of which is attached)† goes as far as the resolution of the General Assembly required. It does not provide for the establishment of the Fund but does call for the completion of such plans as would be necessary if a Fund were to be established. Again, the representatives of the under-developed countries appeared to be reconciled to the situation and to realize that the Council could not go further than the Assembly had gone.

6. In the case of the latter resolution Mr. Deutsch anticipates that the representatives of some of the under-developed countries will insist on making statements (for consumption back home) which will attempt to interpret the resolution as implying that a Fund will eventually be established, although they themselves will be aware from the negotiations of the past week that this question has been left completely open. The Cubans have already made a brief statement to that effect. In Mr. Deutsch's view it should not be necessary to reply to these statements until after the vote, at which time the Canadian representative might explain that in supporting the resolution he was interpreting it to mean what it says and no more. Mr. Deutsch is hopeful that this resolution will also go through without serious opposition.

7. The one major uncertainty in the case of both these resolutions is the attitude of the Soviet bloc. They apparently remained quite silent throughout last week's discussions of the substance of the two proposals. Towards the end of the meeting on Friday, however, when it appeared that the time for voting might be imminent, the Soviet representative suggested that there was no use in attempting to complete the discussion then as his statement would go well beyond the time available. The only other speaker who was down to perform was the Uruguayan representative and he insisted that his speech should come after that of the Soviet delegate. Accordingly the meeting was adjourned to resume on Monday at which time the Soviet representative would lead off and would be followed by the Uruguayan. The meeting did not adjourn, however, before other Soviet-bloc representatives indicated that they also would wish to say their few words on Monday and, inevitably, the U.S. representative indicated that [he] would also wish to make a statement in the circumstances. It is therefore conceivable that the two compromise resolutions may be upset in the course of to-day's debate. Mr. Deutsch is reasonably confident that this will not happen. He found the general feeling in New York that if the Soviet group were to attack these resolutions the effect would probably be to consolidate the non-Soviet delegates in supporting them.

8. In his report on last week's discussions Mr. Deutsch emphasized the constructive role that David Owen<sup>142</sup> had played in influencing the mood of the representatives from the under-developed countries. He also thought that the cooperative attitude displayed by Mr. Black, the President of the International Bank, had been very helpful in improving the atmosphere. The Canadian delegation appears to have been active in helping to produce the compromise drafts, although the actual "negotiations" between the representatives of the developed and under-developed countries had taken place primarily between Lubin of the U.S.<sup>143</sup> and Santa Cruz.<sup>144</sup>

Ottawa, September 26, 1952

Dear Wynne [Plumptre],

When I returned from vacation last week Ed passed to me your letter of August 28+ asking us to let you have a brief summary of what took place at ECOSOC on financing of economic development. The only paper we have available is the Delegation's report, which is probably too detailed for your purposes, so I shall attempt to give you the highlights in a few paragraphs.

As you probably heard before you left Ottawa, the United States was not prepared to take a positive line at the Council on the proposal for the establishment of an international finance corporation. It seems that while there was a good deal of support for the idea in the State Department there was considerable coolness in other quarters, particularly in certain sections of the investment community. They were apparently fearful that such an agency might constitute a thin end of the wedge for governments to interfere in a field which they regard as the exclusive property of private enterprise. The U.S. delegation was hopeful that these conflicting views might be reconciled if further time were given for consultation and explanation of the true purposes of a finance corporation. Meanwhile, however, they were obliged to take a pretty non-committal attitude in ECOSOC. They had prepared and urged us to co-sponsor a resolution which would, in effect, have done little more than return the proposal to the Bank for further study. While we appreciated their position we felt that their draft resolution was too negative and we persuaded them to accept revisions which gave the resolution a more positive twist. It was submitted jointly by the United States and ourselves, as well as the Pakistanis, whom we persuaded, without difficulty, to co-sponsor. It was adopted by 15 votes in favour with the three Soviet countries abstaining. Under this resolution the proposal is returned to the Bank for further examination and for consultation with governments who in turn are requested to consult with national organizations and business groups. The Bank is then to seek the views of its member governments on the desirability of establishing a finance corporation and is to inform the Council during 1953 of the action it has taken. The idea is that the final decision should be taken within the Bank by its member governments and the implication is that the Council hopes the decision will be favourable.

I should add that Mr. Black in his statement on the Bank's report made it quite clear that the management of the Bank was favourably disposed towards the creation of a finance corporation although he emphasized the fact that further careful consideration of the views of governments and potential investors would be necessary before it could be determined whether the organization of a finance corporation would be desirable and practicable. You may also be interested to know that the United Kingdom and France, although they both supported the resolution and agreed that the plan was worthy of further consideration, expressed certain misgivings on particular aspects of the proposal and made it clear that, regardless of the merits of the proposal, their government would not be in a position to contribute to the corporation if it were set up. Belgium, like Canada, indicated a favourable reaction provided sufficient support were obtained to make the establishment of the corporation a practical proposition. The under-developed countries were interested but made it quite clear that they were not disposed to accept a finance corporation as a substitute for international grants-in-aid.

There were no fireworks in connection with the proposed international development fund. We were surprised and greatly relieved when the under-developed countries themselves produced a draft resolution proposing the creation of an expert committee to draw up the blueprint required by the General Assembly. As the experts could not submit a report until the next spring session of the Council the proposal meant, in effect, a year's postponement of the issue. Their draft resolution was submitted informally to the delegations of the developed countries in advance of the Council's discussion. Two or three private meetings were held by representatives of these delegations and it was agreed among them that if certain revisions were made in the text designed to eliminate any implication that approval of the resolution meant approval of the principle of an international fund, the resolution could be accepted. These alterations were sold without difficulty to Mr. Santa Cruz who, despite his observer status, retained his position as leader of the under-developed group. He had in fact, or so he told me at lunch, drawn up the resolution himself and secured the concurrence of the delegations of the other under-developed countries who were co-sponsoring the proposal. It was submitted in the names of Cuba, Iran, Egypt and The Philippines, together with three non-members of the Council, Burma, Chile and Yugoslavia. (The three last-named countries were all represented by observers.) As a result of the sensible attitude taken by the under-developed countries and of the preliminary agreement reached on all sides, the formal discussion on this subject in Council was not of any particular significance. Santa Cruz treated us to a long and quite violent harangue along the usual lines but there was no disposition on the part of others to carry on in this vein. In a private conversation with me after the debate he defended his statement on the grounds that having put forward a mild resolution he felt obliged to give a strong speech so that he might not be suspected of retreating from his well-known position.

The resolution was adopted by 15 votes in favour, with the Soviet Bloc abstaining, and since it was submitted by the under-developed countries themselves we can, I think, assume that it will not be upset in the Assembly.

You may be interested to know that the UN has been trying very hard to get John Deutsch to serve on the expert committee. He was personally much tempted by the invitation but cannot be spared. I believe that the UN is making every effort to collect a really first-class group of practical economists to do this job in the hope that they will produce reasonable and workable proposals which governments will accept. As we will not be on the Council when the experts' report is being considered next spring, it will not be until the Eighth Session of the General Assembly in the fall of next year that we will be called upon to take a public stand on their recommendations.

This summary has turned out to be longer than I intended but I hope it will give you a reasonably clear picture of the present status of the economic development issue.

Yours sincerely,

B.M. MEAGHER

MEMORANDUM FOR MR. PEARSON<sup>145</sup>

COMMITTEE 2: ECONOMIC AND FINANCIAL

Committee 2 was assigned a short agenda of only three items. But the first of these, the Economic Development of Under-Developed Countries, which is No. 25 on the agenda of the General Assembly, was divided into four parts and has so far occupied the time of the Committee.

2. Item 25(d) Technical Assistance for Under-Developed Countries was considered first. Canada was one of the co-sponsors of a resolution which approved the expanded programme of technical assistance and urged governments to contribute to the programme for the year 1953 towards a goal of $25 million dollars as suggested by the Economic and Social Council at its fourteenth session. An amendment by Ecuador proposing a goal of $40 million dollars for 1954 was withdrawn after some debate, and the original resolution, slightly modified, was passed on November 14 by 46 votes in favour, none against, and 5 abstentions from the Soviet bloc. Canada, which contributed $725,000 to the previous programme, will contribute up to $850,000 for 1953, the exact amount depending upon the total pledges by other countries. Many delegations during the debate in Committee 2 explicitly mentioned the intention of their governments either to match or increase for 1953 the contributions they had made for 1952.

3. Item 25(a) Financing of Economic Development of Under-Developed Countries has given rise to no fewer than six draft resolutions. Four of these, submitted one by Cuba, one by Chile, one by Brazil, and one jointly by Egypt, Iraq, Lebanon and Saudi Arabia, were concerned first with the suggestion for an International Development Fund which is to be studied by a group of experts; second with the proposed International Finance Corporation now under study by the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development; and third with the reasons for the inadequate flow of private investment capital to under-developed countries. They were thrown by a working group into a consolidated resolution which was passed on November 20 with no dissenting votes. It has the effect of urging that the studies referred to above be pushed through expeditiously and reports made to the eighth session of the General

CONTRIBUTION TO THE UNITED NATIONS EXPANDED PROGRAMME FOR TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

On June 12, 1950, Cabinet approved a contribution by Canada of $850,000 to the United Nations Expanded Technical Assistance Programme for the first financial period of eighteen months ending December 31, 1951 and on November 21, 1951 Cabinet authorized the Canadian Delegation to the United Nations Assembly in Paris to pledge up to a similar amount to the Programme for the year 1952, "the extent of the Canadian contribution to depend on the amounts pledged by other countries and on the Delegation being fully satisfied with the nature of the Programme." The actual Canadian contribution was $750,000.

2. On the basis that an increase in the contributions over those pledged for 1952 was necessary, in order to leave room for reasonable enlargement of the Expanded Programme, the Economic and Social Council has urged governments to make contributions to the Programme for the year 1953 toward the goal of $25 million and has recommended that the General Assembly make arrangements for soliciting and receiving pledges from governments. This total represents an increase of $5 million or 20 per cent over the target set for last year.

3. I understand that the United States Delegation has been authorized to pledge, at the meeting of the Negotiating Committee which is to take place during the present session of the General Assembly, the amount of $14.7 million provided this amount does not exceed 60 per cent of the total of the contributions pledged for 1953. This represents an increase of $2.7 million or 23.5 per cent over the limit of $12 million which the U.S. Delegation was authorized to pledge last year, subject to a similar proviso.

4. Canada was represented on the working party of the Economic and Social Council which formulated the recommendations about the operation of the Programme for the year 1953. The Programme is overcoming its earlier operational difficulties and is proving its effectiveness. It is one of the most worthwhile activities of the United Nations to which Canada is a contributor both in the promotion of international good will and in its concrete results. In the circumstances it would be reasonable to continue participating in the Programme on the same scale as last year.

5. I recommend, therefore, that the Canadian Delegation to the General Assembly be authorized to pledge an amount up to $850,000 as the Canadian contribution to the United Nations Programme for the year 1953. The precise amount of the Canadian contribution should depend this year, as in the past, upon the total amount pledged by other countries.

UNITED NATIONS EXPANDED PROGRAMME FOR TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE; CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION

50. The Prime Minister said the Minister of National Defence, as Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, had submitted a memorandum recommending that the Canadian delegation to the General Assembly of the United Nations be authorized to pledge an amount up to $850,000 as the Canadian contribution to the United Nations Expanded Programme for Technical Assistance for the year 1953. The contribution authorized in 1950 had been $850,000 and in November 1951 a similar contribution had been authorized for 1952, provided that the exact figure should depend on the amounts pledged by other countries. The actual Canadian contribution had been $750,000. The goal of the programme for 1953 was $25 million, which was an increase of 20 percent over the 1952 target. The U.S. delegation had been authorized to pledge $14.7 million, provided that did not exceed 60 percent of the total contributions for 1953. The U.S. authorization represented an increase of $2.7 million over the U.S. contribution in 1952. The programme was proving effective and it was desirable for Canada to continue to participate.

Copies of the memorandum had been circulated.

52. The Cabinet approved the recommendation of the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, and agreed that the Canadian delegation to the General Assembly of the United Nations be authorized to pledge an amount up to $850,000 as the Canadian contribution to the United Nations Expanded Programme for Technical Assistance for 1953; the precise amount of the contribution to depend upon the total amount pledged by other countries.

8 — Budget Estimates for 1953

Persistent increases in the budgets of most Specialized Agencies in recent years have caused growing concern among many member countries, who are called upon to come forward with ever-growing contributions. The stabilization of these budgets is urgently required and has been repeatedly urged by responsible member countries, by the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions, and by the General Assembly of the United Nations itself. Canada has taken a leading role in urging stabilization, and Canadian delegations to all United Nations bodies are being instructed this year to insist that stabilization policies be implemented.

The expansion of the ILO budget has been particularly disturbing, since the ILO is one of the oldest and best established of the United Nations bodies. In 1947, its net budget was $3,727,332. By 1949 it had increased to over $5 million. The budget proposed by the Director General for 1953 is $6,678,897, or almost double the 1947 budget level.

Since the net budget for 1952 was $6,224,922, the increase proposed by the Director General for the 1953 budget is therefore $453,975, or about 8 per cent. An increase of this amount indicates that the repeated requests of responsible countries for budgetary stabilization are not being met.

The Canadian Delegation should emphasize the necessity for stabilization of expenditure by the ILO. This does not mean that the present ILO programme should be fixed in its present form, nor that no new tasks should be undertaken. It does mean, however, that the adoption of essential new services should be accompanied by the elimination of projects of lower priorities, and that new duties should be met by re-organization of staff rather than by staff expansion.

The proposed 1953 budget should be closely examined by the Finance Committee and the Governing Body, with a view to achieving every possible economy consistent with the effective functioning of the organization. The Canadian Delegation should not hesitate to take the initiative in urging the adoption of measures to achieve such economies and should energetically support proposals by other representatives for reducing costs.

The following paragraphs indicate a number of places where budgetary savings could be made. These economies are suggested by way of example only. The Delegation is, of course, in the best position to search the 1953 programme and budget, in co-operation with other responsible delegations, for other means of stabilizing the 1953 budget.

Last year, the Finance Committee, at its March meeting, was able to reduce the Director General's proposed budget of $6,561,669 to $6,169,922. (This reduced budget still represented a considerable increase over the 1951 budget of $5,973,789.) It is expected that the Finance Committee will similarly be able to discover means of achieving savings in the 1953 budget. The Delegation should oppose budgetary proposals that do not, in its opinion, adequately meet the test of budgetary stabilization.

DESPATCH No. V-47

118TH SESSION OF THE I.L.O. GOVERNING BODY:
ADMINISTRATIVE AND FINANCIAL INSTRUCTIONS

Attached for your guidance at the meetings of the I.L.O. Financial and Administrative Committee and of the Governing Body are a set of instructions† on the items of importance which may arise at that time. These have been prepared by the Department of Finance in consultation with the Department of Labour and this Department. You are asked to play as active a role as possible in the light of these instructions which stress the great need for economy and budget stabilization. No doubt other opportunities for achieving economy without impairing the efficiency of the I.L.O. will present themselves to you during the course of the meetings. You should, of course, take every advantage of these occasions if you consider that the Office is asking for unnecessary expenditures or is not budgeting on a sound, economical basis.

2. We are given to understand that, in all probability, the United Kingdom Government Representative will be pressing strongly for economy in the I.L.O. budget and may go so far as to propose that the 1953 budget should be stabilized at the 1952 figure. This would mean that the Director-General's proposed increases for 1953 would be opposed by the United Kingdom. We have told the United Kingdom Government Representative, informally, that we too will stress the importance of economy where feasible, provided these efforts do not impair the efficiency of the Organization. We therefore welcome this United Kingdom initiative. You might wish to meet with your United Kingdom colleague on the Financial and Administrative Committee before the meetings begin to work out a common approach with him, if feasible.

FINANCIAL AND ADMINISTRATIVE COMMITTEE OF ILO GOVERNING BODY

As a result of the government representatives insistence of need for economies, Director-General submitted to committee yesterday proposals for reductions in 1953 budget estimates totalling 512,849 dollars which is approximately one-fifth of the original 1953 estimates. Committee unanimously adopted Director-General proposals which in effect reduce 1953 budget to a figure 1,554 dollars below budget appropriation for 1952.

Ottawa, October 2, 1952

Mr. David Morse, Director-General of the International Labour Organization, called on me yesterday to discuss the size of the ILO budget. Mr. Morse had had earlier conversations on this subject with the Minister of Labour and the Deputy Minister of Labour, but he also wished to let me know his views.

2. Mr. Morse explained that since he has been Director-General he has endeavoured to present fair budget estimates for the consideration of the ILO Governing Body and Conference, and in the early years the Governing Body and Conference approved budgets providing for moderate increases over previous years to take account of mounting costs and increased responsibilities. Prior to the budget session of the Governing Body this year, representatives of certain governments informed Mr. Morse that their governments were alarmed at the expanding budgets of international organizations and urged him to use his influence to stabilize the ILO budget. Mr. Morse said that he well understood the position of these governments and consequently, when the budget estimates for 1953 were being considered, Mr. Morse accepted a budget figure several hundred dollars lower than that of the previous year. Although the workers' group, and to a lesser extent the employers' group, did not like this situation, Mr. Morse was satisfied that his action had been sound.

3. However, Mr. Morse pointed out to me that he had agreed to a reduction of the 1953 budget, and had so informed the government representatives who approached him, on the understanding that similar action would be taken in other international organizations. Although Mr. Morse emphasized that he did not wish to imply criticism of other organizations, he drew my attention to the fact that the budgets of other specialized agencies have in fact been increased since the ILO budget was reduced. In view of this situation, and the pressure being brought on the ILO for expanded activities, the Director-General does not believe that he can in fairness to the organization recommend or accept for 1954 a budget of the same amount as that which was approved for 1953.

4. Mr. Morse told me frankly that he will put forward to the Governing Body and Conference the budget estimates which will in his opinion reflect the needs of the organization. However, he will be prepared for some reduction in these figures. He hopes to reach agreement, however, on a budget figure which will be perhaps 5% higher than the 1953 budget. I understand from our own files that this would mean an increase of approximately $12,000 in the Canadian contribution to ILO, assuming that the rate of our percentage contribution remains the same. Mr. Morse hoped that I would give consideration to this situation so that our Delegation to the budget session of the Governing Body and to the Conference will be able to accept some moderate budgetary increase for 1954.

5. I informed Mr. Morse that his representations would be given careful consideration here and would be borne in mind when instructions are prepared for the Canadian Delegation to the Governing Body and the Conference.

6. I thought that you would be interested in knowing of this conversation.

1. At their request, we discussed yesterday the matter of the scale of contributions to the ILO with officials of the State Department. They informed us that they have been considering what the United States position should be when the ILO Governing Body considers the scale of contributions and, before taking a final decision, would prefer to know the results of General Assembly action regarding the United States contribution to the United Nations. They wondered, therefore, if we would be agreeable to having final action on the scale of contributions taken at the March 1953 meeting of the Governing Body rather than at its November meeting. State Department officials realize that we have taken a strong interest in this matter and recalled that the Canadian representative to the ILO Allocations Committee last year had taken the lead in pressing for an upward revision of the United States contribution to ILO. They are also asking the United Kingdom and Australian Embassies for their views on postponing final action on the scale of contributions until March 1953.

2. State Department officials gave us no indication that they were contemplating a change in their position. They did point out that even if they were disposed to agree to an increase in the United States contribution to ILO, the amount of their contribution would still be subject to the limitations contained in Public Law 806 (81st Congress). We were informed that the United States delegation to the General Assembly will press strongly for a reduction in the United States contribution to the United Nations to 33½ percent.

3. We would be grateful to know whether or not it will be possible for you to give the State Department an informal assurance that the Canadian delegate will not press for final action on the scale of contributions at the November meeting of the ILO Governing Body.

While there is a good case for pressing for an increase in the United States contribution we realize that the unusual circumstances surrounding the November meeting of the Governing Body will probably prevent us from achieving our objective at that time. The presidential and congressional elections and discussions on contributions at the United Nations General Assembly will make it difficult for the United States delegation to consider an increase in their ILO assessment at the November meeting. The United States might be more receptive to an upward adjustment at the March meeting.

2. In the circumstances it will be in order for you to tell the State Department officials informally that we are prepared to support at the November meeting a move to postpone until the March meeting final action on the scale of contributions, provided the State Department officials will give you informal assurance that they will give sympathetic consideration to the problem when it is raised in March.

3. Paragraph 3 of telegram No. 31 of October 20+ from the Canadian Delegation to the General Assembly, copy of which was referred to you, suggests that such assurance may be forthcoming.

CANADIAN DELEGATION TO THE 1952 UNESCO CONFERENCE

Attached for your information is a copy of a letter† dated October to the Director-General of UNESCO, informing him of the composition of the Canadian delegation to the Seventh Session of the General Conference, which is to be held in Paris from November 12 to December 10, 1952. You will notice that Mr. E.H. Norman will be attending the Fourth Meeting of Representatives of National Commissions as observer for Canada and that Mr. J.E.G. Hardy (who dealt with United Nations financial matters from 1948-50 when on loan to the Department of Finance) will be the Canadian representative on the Budget Committee which meets ten days before the General Conference.

2. In view of your extensive experience with UNESCO matters, both as Chairman of previous delegations and as a member of the Executive Board, it would seem appropriate that you should be elected to one of the ten Vice-Presidencies at the Seventh Session. This would ensure Canadian representation on the Steering Committee of the Conference and would be a suitable recognition of Canada's substantial contributions to UNESCO. You will recall that the only other occasion when Canada received this honour was in 1948.

3. As you are probably aware, the Executive Board has recommended that a Legal Committee of fifteen members be elected to consider amendments to the Constitution and the Rules of Procedure. The Canadian delegation will have a member especially qualified to deal with legal matters, Mr. Paul Gerin-Lajoie, who would seem to be a logical choice for membership on the Legal Committee. Mr. Paul Gerin-Lajoie is a Montreal lawyer and former Rhodes Scholar who has gained considerable renown as an authority on the Canadian constitution.

4. A recommendation that Canada support Sir Sarnepalli Radhakrishnan, the Chairman of the Indian delegation, for the Presidency of this year's Conference is included in the instructions being prepared for the delegation. This recommendation is based upon the need for recognizing the cultural contribution of South East Asia and upon the outstanding qualifications of Dr. Radhakrishnan, who is now Vice-President of India. In view of our Commonwealth association with India, it would not seem inappropriate for the initiative in this matter to come from Canada, in the event that the Executive Board has not already suggested India for the Presidency in the report it is preparing for the Nominations Committee.

5. Because of our interest in election to a Vice-Presidency and to the Legal Committee and because of our possible sponsorship of India for the Presidency, you may wish to arrive in Paris a few days before the Conference for policy meetings with members of the Canadian delegation and for informal discussions with other national delegates and senior members of the secretariat. Your long and friendly association with UNESCO will undoubtedly be very helpful in these matters.

Memorandum from Information Division to Vice-Chairman, Delegation to Seventh General Conference of UNESCO<sup>2</sup>

Ottawa, October 17, 1952

At the brief policy meeting scheduled for 11:00 a.m. Saturday morning to consider the aspects of the UNESCO Conference of major importance to Canada, you may wish to discuss the following questions:

(a) Financial Policy

At past Conferences, Canada has gained the reputation of being a financial watchdog. Although this has its unfortunate aspects, it is a necessary role since many UNESCO projects tend to be rather obscure in their aims and diffuse in their methods. Mr. Vest of the U.S. Embassy indicated that the United States delegation will probably welcome support from Canada in checking over-ambitious schemes that often obtain the backing of member states whose contributions are much more modest.

UNESCO's proposed budget for the next two years would require an increase from $8.7 million in 1952 to $9.9 million in 1953 and a further increase to $10.8 million in 1954. The Secretariat has in fact budgeted for an expanded programme of priority projects to be financed by the more conscientious member states, with additional lower priority schemes to be undertaken only if payment of arrears is received from the usual defaulters. Arrears are estimated at 7.8% of the total budget.

I understand that the Department of Finance will press for the stabilization of the budget at its present level, $8.7 million. Adoption of this proposal would mean the elimination of low priority schemes and concentration on high priority projects such as Technical Assistance and Fundamental Education; and it would undoubtedly require quite a drastic reduction in the programme suggested by UNESCO for 1953 and 1954. Such an approach might meet with a good deal of opposition since it would affect jobs on the Secretariat. However, since the budget for 1953-54 is apparently well padded, it is not likely that, with support from the United States and the United Kingdom, a demand for stabilization of the budget might result in a more realistic compromise of slightly over $9 million a year. This would be contributed by member states, possibly on a modified per capita basis.

One aspect of Finance's probable instructions that might generate more heat than light is the suggestion that all UNESCO Conferences be held at the Headquarters in Paris unless the prospective host country is prepared to meet the cost of transferring the Secretariat half-way across the world (approximately $300,000 per Conference). It appears to be fairly generally accepted that the 1954 Conference will be held in Montevideo. Opposition by Canada to this move would undoubtedly be extremely unpopular with the Latin American countries and probably also with other possible host countries such as Japan and India. Holding all meetings in Paris would also be contrary to the established practice of the Organization which has held previous Conferences in Mexico, Beirut and Florence. Unless Canada had some assurance of support for this proposal, the Canadian delegation might be an unpleasant voice crying in the wilderness.

(b) Programme Priorities

The Canadian delegation may wish to emphasize the importance of concentrating UNESCO's resources on those aspects of its programme which offer the most concrete results: Technical Assistance, Exchange of Persons and Fundamental Education. These are activities to which countries like Canada can contribute most and from which under-developed countries can benefit most. The United States has now requested that a working party be set up to study priorities and this should have our enthusiastic support since the Canadian delegation initiated the idea of priorities at the Florence Conference. The delegation might also suggest some reduction in the number of UNESCO publications. While this might effect some improvement in the Organization's budget and reputation, it would entail no great loss to the world's cultural development.

(c) Canada Council

As the Government is now considering the establishment of a Canada Council which would also act as a National Commission for UNESCO, the Canadian delegation might suggest in its report ways in which a Canada Council could effectively coordinate Canadian participation in the programme activities approved by the Conference. A report on the meetings of National Commission representatives should be particularly useful as a basis for a possible submission to Cabinet after the Conference.

You may wish to inform officials in the State Department concerned with UNESCO that:

(1) We definitely favour the stabilization of the UNESCO budget for 1953-54 at the 1952 level, and that we will support the U.S. delegation in all measures designed to improve administrative efficiency and economy of the organization, as well as to promote sound planning and effective execution of the programmes;

(2) We are opposed to holding the 1954 General Conference away from Paris, in line with our policy in the United Nations and the Specialized Agencies to advocate the holding of conferences at Headquarters;

(3) We do not think it necessary to have an informal meeting in Washington unless the State Department has any particular questions in mind; but our delegation, part of which has already left for France, would welcome informal discussions with members of the U.S. delegation before the opening of the Conference.

BUDGET COMMITTEE

Following for J.E.G. Hardy:

The Director-General has drawn attention, in Document 76/ADM/8, page 1, to the net deficit of $440,595 in 1951, which resulted from arrears of contributions for that year amounting to $1,519,009. However, he anticipates that payment of arrears by the end of 1952 will be sufficient, not only to eliminate the deficit, but to yield a net surplus.

Even if the funds are forthcoming, the practice of deficit financing is, in our opinion, undesirable. The General Assembly has recommended (Resolution 311 (iv)) that the United Nations and all Specialized Agencies should limit annual expenditures to those amounts which they can reasonably expect to receive in each budgetary year. This practice has already been accepted by the United Nations and most of the Agencies and should become the basis for future UNESCO budgetary policy.

You should use your discretion as to when these views might be brought to the Committee's attention.

FINANCING OF THE 1953 AND 1954 BUDGETS

Following from the Canadian Delegation to UNESCO, Paris, Begins:

1. The United States delegation will take the line that the 1953-54 budgets should be stabilized at the 1952 level of 8.7 million dollars, this ceiling figure representing the basis on which assessments would be calculated. The United States believes that such stabilization might be possible provided that special measures can be devised to compensate for the contributions which it is almost certain will not be paid. The main factor which might upset the United States expectation that a stabilized budget might receive the support of the majority is that the Latin American delegations might press for the immediate adoption of Spanish as a full working language.

2. Countries in arrear in paying their contributions may be divided into three categories:

(a) Nationalist China which, though still theoretically assessed at more than six per cent, only makes a token payment corresponding to approximately 0.15 per cent in the 1952 budget. China has now formally requested that its percentage be reduced to reflect this token payment.

(b) The three Cominform members, Poland, Czechoslovakia and Hungary, who have ceased active participation but continue to be assessed, their combined percentage in the proposed UNESCO scale for 1953 amounting to 3.32 per cent.

(c) Slow payers such as Argentina, Italy, etc.

3. The United States may propose that the reduction in the Chinese contribution should be made up by:

(a) the contributions to be received from the three new members Spain, Nepal and Libya, which would total 1.47 per cent;

(b) spreading the difference among all other members who might be prepared to accept a higher assessment. This would not apply to the United States, which enjoys a ceiling of 33⅓ per cent, or to those six countries, including Canada, whose contribution on a per capita basis is higher than that of the United States.

4. The short fall in revenue representing the contribution of the three Cominform members would be compensated by expected miscellaneous income and by available surpluses from previous years.

5. As far as arrears resulting from slow payers are concerned, the United States will argue as we will, that it is improper to sanction their conduct by providing a special "cushion" in the budget in anticipation of failures to contribute.

6. The above course, if favorably received by the conference, would eliminate the necessity for the B1 and B2 priority financing proposed by the Director-General in his budget. Furthermore, the United States hopes that this procedure will reduce the pressure for an expansion of the organization's activity beyond the A1 level on the part of those countries which might be prepared to share the reduction in the Chinese contribution.

7. As a prerequisite to our supporting the United States position, we would have to agree to a delay in the full application of the per capita ceiling principle. In effect, however, the above device would constitute a further recognition by the conference of the validity of the principle and an indirect application of it.

8. I am inclined to think that, given the particularly difficult situation facing UNESCO, the solution proposed by the United States is both ingenious and tactically sound. I should like to know, however, whether there would be any objection on political and financial grounds to my giving it full and active support.

9. Canada has been elected chairman of the committee on contributions. Hardy is serving. The first item on the agenda of the committee on Monday morning is the question of the reduction in the Chinese contribution. Instructions on this point are therefore urgently needed and account should be taken in sending them of the 5 hour time lag between Ottawa and Paris. I will assume that Canada has no fundamental objection to the United States attitude if no specific instructions have been received by the time the committee convenes for its afternoon meeting on Monday. Ends.

Following from the Canadian Delegation to UNESCO, Begins:

1. Director-General Torres Bodet resigned this morning giving as his reason the rejection by the plenary session yesterday of the 20.4 million budget level for the next two years which he and the Executive Board had been advocating.

He made it clear that he still would have resigned if his proposal had been passed by a bare majority; he added that this was only the culmination of similar disappointments and frustration in the past. If he were to continue he would have had to receive a clear mandate from the conference. Presumably this mandate would entail the support of the larger contributors.

2. He made it absolutely clear that his resignation was irrevocable: he was "burnt out", he had lost heart and faith in the organization. Consequently, even should the conference re-open the question or reverse itself on the budget ceiling, his resignation must be regarded as final.

3. Dr. Carneiro, President of the Executive Board, also resigned for the same reasons. Then the Yugoslav member of the Executive Board resigned giving as an additional reason his disagreement with the procedure by which the admission of Spain was adopted. He complained that there was lack of full and free discussion on the question.

4. There is no doubt that many observers here recognize that UNESCO is faced with a deep crisis. Although Bodet's resignation has no connection with Lie's<sup>3</sup> it is observed here that these events will serve to disturb public confidence in these two great international organizations. There is evident here a sense of demoralization as a sequel to these resignations.

5. As Bodet's resignation is effective today, Taylor, Deputy Director-General, will act as Director-General. Sir Ronald Adam, Vice-President of the Executive Board, will act as its chairman. We will soon be approached, by friendly delegations and officially by UNESCO, for our view on the choice of a new Director-General. We would be grateful, therefore, if you would give the matter some thought as we will be referring to you for instructions.

6. For the present we are not, repeat not, inclined towards precipitate action in choice of Director-General and this is the attitude also of the United Kingdom and United States delegations. We would wish to see the matter handled in the normal procedure, as provided by UNESCO constitution, thus giving all delegations opportunity for mature deliberation.

7. There is a possibility that some delegation may move to re-open the debate on the budget meeting. Pending further instructions on this point, we assume you would not, repeat not, wish us to give support to such a step. This might become an awkward question in view of the strong sentiment among the less developed countries who feel that the economy measures adopted by the richer powers indicate growing indifference to their own problems. Ends.

DEVELOPMENTS IN UNESCO CRISIS

Reference My telegram No. 1033 of November 22, 1952.

Following from UNESCO delegation, Begins:

1. At the Steering Committee on Saturday, November 22, it was decided on United States proposal that Sharif of Pakistan be the Acting President of the general conference in the sudden absence of Radhakrishnan who had been recalled by his government.

2. United States delegation held informal meeting including United Kingdom, Australia, Norway, Denmark and Canada late that night. Three points were emphasized by members of the United States delegation:

- (a) Budget question not to be reopened;
- (b) Bodet's resignation is a closed incident;
- (c) UNESCO must be salvaged.

United States fully supports Sharif who appeared later at the meeting and who has taken the responsibility of trying to reconcile the views of the under-developed and Latin American countries with those of the larger contributing powers. There is a sentiment among delegates of the former group that the richer powers are responsible for having caused the crisis by their budgetary policy.

3. Sharif initiated private talks with heads of delegations Sunday, November 23. At Steering Committee this morning he was encouraged to proceed rapidly with these talks and was asked to report to the committee tomorrow morning.

4. No plenary sessions will be held until Sharif and the Steering Committee feel that negotiations have to some extent at least solved the crisis. Meanwhile all other commissions are to carry on their business as usual.

5. German and French and possibly other delegations have suggested that if the Programme Commission, through a detailed discussion of the items of the programme, find that some of the most desired activities cannot be carried on at present budget level, the appropriate increase in the budget should be approved by the member states. This appears to us as an indirect way of trying to re-open the budget question. Ends.

DEVELOPMENTS IN UNESCO CRISIS

Reference: My telegram No. 1034 of November 22, 1952.

Following from UNESCO, Begins: In accordance with decision made at yesterday morning's Steering Committee Mr. Sharif of Pakistan, Acting President of the conference, met privately with heads of delegations.

2. I saw him yesterday evening and following are his views: He is acting as a sort of mediator between those delegations who committed not to go above 18 million ceiling and others, mostly under-developed countries, who desired higher ceiling. In order to avoid recriminatory speeches in plenary session from those delegations who feel that resignation of Bodet was result of inflexible attitude on budget of larger contributing governments, he hoped that these latter delegations would not, repeat not, object to a policy which would tacitly permit any delegation to raise the question of supplementary budgeting after projects had been discussed in detail in Programme Commission. Those delegations who would allow this procedure would not, repeat not, be committed to promising favourable consideration to request for increased budget in any specific project. The real purpose of this would be to provide a cooling-off period. If some such method were not, repeat not, adopted he thought it would be difficult, when the plenary session convened again, to prevent delegations making requests that the budget question, in some fashion or other, be thrown open again to debate.

3. It is too early yet for us to judge whether this plan will materialize or whether it will receive the support of the delegations with which we have worked most closely on the budget. We would prefer, therefore, to adopt a waiting attitude while not rejecting the plan out of hand. In the meantime, I should be grateful for any comments you would wish to make. Ends.

Following for UNESCO Delegation, Begins: We have found your series of messages on the UNESCO crisis most helpful and informative and we agree with the general line you are taking.

2. We have had from New York an indication of Mr. Pearson's reaction on the basis of the limited information available in the press there. He feels that the proposals for budgetary stabilization are reasonable and sound and he sees no reason for the Delegation to alter its stand. He also subscribes to the view attributed to the head of the United States Delegation inferring that Bodet should have been willing to abide by a budgetary decision "democratically arrived at".

3. Discussion of supplementary budgeting has obvious dangers, but if it were to show promise as a device for letting off steam without leading to an increased budget there would be arguments in its favour. We agree you should adopt a waiting attitude and keep in touch with the Delegations with which you have been consulting. In general our view is that efforts should be made to soothe the feelings of the underdeveloped countries without increasing the budget or reversing decisions already reached. Ends.

[PIÈCE JOINTE/ENCLOSURE]

REPORT

REPORT OF THE CANADIAN DELEGATION TO THE SEVENTH SESSION OF THE GENERAL CONFERENCE OF UNESCO,
PARIS, NOVEMBER 12-DECEMBER 11, 1952

It has become customary to refer to various General Conferences of UNESCO in terms of crises and turning points. The Seventh General Conference held at Paris from November 12th to December 11th, 1952, was no exception. It is no exaggeration to say that this was a critical conference for UNESCO; it would be incorrect to say that the crisis has been happily surmounted and that the Organization can now proceed confidently on a stable course. The different national conceptions of the work which UNESCO can and should do caused a serious rift midway through the conference and at its close there had been only a patchy and uneasy bridging of the rift.

The Canadian Delegation to the Seventh General Conference of UNESCO consisted of the following:

Chairman:	Dr. Victor Doré, Canadian Minister to Switzerland and Austria
Vice-Chairman:	Mr. E.H. Norman, Department of External Affairs
Delegates:	Mr. T.A.M. Kirk, M.P. for Digby-Yarmouth Mr. Garnet T. Page, General Manager, Chemical Institute of Canada Mr. Paul Gérin-Lajoie, Montreal lawyer
Alternate Delegate:	Miss M.E. Conway, President Canadian Teachers' Federation
Adviser:	Mr. René Garneau, Department of External Affairs
Financial Adviser:	Mr. J.E.G. Hardy, Department of External Affairs
Adviser and Secretary:	Mr. Blair Seaborn, Department of External Affairs

Site of the Eighth General Conference of UNESCO

The action taken by the Sixth General Conference commending to the Seventh Conference the invitation of the Government of Uruguay to hold the Eighth Conference at Montevideo virtually predetermined the decision. Several delegations stressed the extra cost of holding general conferences away from the permanent headquarters of the Organization — an extra cost which could only be met by funds which otherwise would be devoted to programme activities. They also stressed the difficulties and disorganization for the secretariat. Some countries warned that the distance and the additional cost would make it impossible for them to send full delegations, or perhaps any delegations at all. It was known, moreover, that the more responsible members of the secretariat were opposed to holding the next General Conference at Montevideo. Nevertheless, the argument that this was an effective way of publicizing UNESCO and making its work known on the South American continent — in our opinion a rather specious argument — won the day. When it came to a vote, the Conference voted 28-13-12 in favour of Montevideo. It is expected that the 1954 Conference will be held in May or September of that year; the decision rests in the hands of the Executive Board.

Admission of New Members to UNESCO

The admission of Nepal and Libya created no difficulties. The admission of Spain, however, aroused strong feeling among those few delegations which strongly opposed admission, and caused uneasiness amongst delegations which did not wish to take a strong stand either way. Somewhat weakly, and with obvious relief, the General Conference accepted a resolution precluding debate on the admission of Spain, which was voted by the large majority of 44-4-7. Spain's admission without debate led the Yugoslav member of the Executive Board to announce his resignation (which he later agreed to withdraw until the National Commission could review the issue) and resulted in the resignation of a member of each of the French and Belgian delegations. We voted in favour of Spain's admission on the ground that UNESCO's objective was universal membership and that it was a non-political organization. It is to be hoped that the Spanish Government will co-operate in action and in spirit with the work of UNESCO, for otherwise there will certainly be recriminations at succeeding conferences about its admission.

Withdrawal of Poland

A letter was received from the Polish Embassy in Paris in the last days of the Conference denouncing the nature of the Organization and announcing Poland's withdrawal from membership. This can be construed as the answer of one Iron Curtain country to the admission of Spain. It was not a startling development because Poland, Czechoslovakia and Hungary had not taken part in the work of the Organization since the Florence Conference. But it may possibly presage the withdrawal of Iron Curtain countries from other Specialized Agencies in the work of which they have ceased to participate. A letter has been sent from UNESCO urging the Polish Government to reconsider its decision, but it seems highly improbable that this will have any effect, particularly since Hungary and Czechoslovakia have announced since the conference their intention of withdrawing.

Debate on the Budget Ceiling

The programme and budget estimates prepared by the Director-General, Dr. Torres Bodet, and approved by the Executive Board for presentation to the General Conference, called for a budget of $20,400,000 for 1953 and 1954. This, according to the Director-General, was the minimum necessary to carry out the essential parts of UNESCO's programme. This figure represented a substantial increase over the budget ceiling of $8,700,000 for the year 1952.

The debate on the budget ceiling, which was held a little over a week after the beginning of the conference, probably was the most critical of the session. On the one side were those countries which supported the Director-General's entire programme and considered that it constituted one more modest step in the direction of a constantly expanding UNESCO programme. They saw an almost limitless field of worth-while projects in education, science and culture, and thought that only through UNESCO could these worth-while projects be initiated. Although the division of countries into those which thought in this expansive way and those with a more conservative bent was not entirely clearcut, predominant among the former were the Latin American countries, plus some of the more important countries of Asia and Africa. It was easy not to have much sympathy for the plea for expansion put forward by the Latin American countries. But it was more difficult to ignore and remain untouched by the words of the delegates from the underdeveloped countries of Asia and Africa, who argued quite sincerely that great promise had been held out to them by the more advanced countries in the early days of the Organization, while it now seemed that they were being betrayed and forgotten.

On the other side, those countries which spoke in favour of a more modest budget, including the United States, the United Kingdom and ourselves, used the argument of heavy commitments in other fields and the inability to give unlimited funds to UNESCO. This argument did not go down well with countries less rich than ourselves, especially when the budget for UNESCO is, relatively speaking, a small one. The United States put forward a very good defence for a reduced budget, saying that the amount of money which we were all willing to give to the furtherance of UNESCO's work should not be considered merely as the total of our contributions to the Organization itself. We could do a great deal to further its work by giving greater assistance to National Commissions and to the non-governmental organizations which cooperate with UNESCO, and by making funds available for exchange of persons projects. This approach is certainly a more positive one than that of limited ability to pay; but we and other friendly delegations should have been in a position to couple with it a more constructive and critical approach to specific programme items so as to explain why we were not willing to give all the money which the Director-General wanted.

A compromise proposal providing for a budget ceiling of $18,000,000 for the two years was finally put forward late in the discussion and was carried by the rather narrow majority of 29-21-4. The closeness of the vote showed how far from unanimous was the feeling of the General Conference as to the nature of the Organization.

Although the ceiling of $18,000,000 will mean a higher assessment for the forthcoming two years, the money available for the programme each year actually will be less than in the year 1952. There will be an effective spending budget of just over $17,000,000. Finally, it will cost, approximately, an additional $300,000 to hold the Eighth Conference in Montevideo rather than in Paris. Secondly, non-recurring funds were used in 1952 to cover the expected shortfall in contributions and to permit the carrying out of projects which could not otherwise have been financed. This year no such funds are available. Thirdly, the estimated annual percentage of contributions considered uncollectable rose from 7.5 per cent in 1952 to 9.2 per cent in 1953-54. For all these reasons, there will be reduced programme activity.

One of the causes of the budget crisis was constitutional vagueness concerning responsibility for preparation of the programme and budget estimates. In theory, the Executive Board prepared the programme and the Director-General assembled the budget estimates necessary to implement it. There was considerable evidence that, in fact, the programme was largely Dr. Bodet's, and that some members of the Executive Board had expressed serious misgivings about the acceptability to Member States of his proposals. During the conference, the constitution was amended to give the Director-General full responsibility for the preparation of the programme and corresponding budget. The Executive Board will submit these to the General Conference with its recommendations. This clarification of the respective powers and responsibilities of the administrative, executive and legislative organs should help the work of future conferences and lessen the chance of conflicts.

The Budget Committee was hampered in its consideration of the budget estimates prior to the opening of the General Conference by the Director-General's insistence that it neither examine the relative merits, in financial terms, of the projects in the programme, nor relate the proposed budget to the general financial policies of the fifteen Member States on the Committee. It was, therefore, limited to a rather meaningless analysis of the costing accuracy of each project. Fortunately, the Budget Committee for the 1954 conference has been transformed into an Advisory Committee on Programme and Budget with enlarged terms of reference. It will have full power to examine, before the General Conference opens, the programme and budget of the Director-General, as well as the Executive Board's comments on them. It will also examine and advise on new proposals by member states or the Executive Board. Such a committee should facilitate the work of the General Conference through the elimination of the artificial distinction between the substantive and budgetary aspects of programme projects. Canada again was elected to serve on this Committee.

Resignation of the Director-General

On November 22, the morning after the budget was fixed, Dr. Bodet announced, with great emotion his intention of resigning his post as Director-General of UNESCO. He said that he had "burned himself out" in his efforts to make the Organization what he thought it could and should be. Faced with a choice between retreat, stabilization, or advance by the Organization, the Executive Board and he himself had spoken in favour of advance, but the Conference had, in his opinion, chosen retreat. He said that he had lost heart and faith and could no longer continue in this job. He would, he said, have resigned even had his proposed programme and budget been accepted by the General Conference by a small majority. He could not carry on unless he thought that a large majority of the member States were whole-heartedly behind him in his endeavours. He said very plainly that his resignation was irrevocable, and everyone realized that it was not the same sort of rather petulant resignation which he had handed in during the Florence Conference. His resignation was followed by that of Dr. Paulo Carneiro of Brazil, the Chairman of the Executive Board, who associated himself fully with the Director-General's statement.

It is still too early to judge whether the crisis of the budget and the resignation has been surmounted successfully. As was pointed out after the resignation of Dr. Bodet by Mr. Malik, Indian Ambassador to France and head of the Indian Delegation in the absence of Sir Sarvepalli Radhakrishnan, the repercussions in distant countries, particularly less-developed ones such as his own, could not be gauged by those sitting in the conference rooms of UNESCO. In the narrowest sense, the problem is unresolved. Whatever criticisms may be levelled at Dr. Bodet, he was a powerful personality who commanded the respect of all those who have worked with him. He had considerably improved the administrative efficiency of UNESCO, and he kept before him the highest ideals of the Organization. He may have been tactless in some quarters, and no doubt he may have made enemies where, by greater tact or conciliation, he could have made friends. But his absence was keenly felt in the latter sessions of UNESCO, particularly in the Programme Commission, where a weak chairman was unable to get satisfactory guidance from the Acting Director-General or his assistants. Thus the choice of a suitable successor presents a real problem.

To carry on in Dr. Bodet's place, the General Conference appointed Dr. John W. Taylor, Dr. Bodet's deputy, to serve as Acting Director-General until a new Director-General is appointed. This will take place at an extraordinary session to be held in the spring of 1953. Dr. Taylor, an American, formerly a university president, is well qualified to be Acting Director-General for a short time. He is able and intelligent, but does not have the dynamism of Dr. Bodet. He would not be a suitable person to act as permanent Director-General, and apparently is aware of this himself.

The Efforts at Reconciliation

The day before Dr. Bodet's resignation, Sir Sarvepalli Radhakrishnan, President of the General Conference, had left hurriedly for India at Mr. Nehru's request. To succeed him as Acting President, the steering committee chose Mr. S.M. Sharif, the Head of the Pakistan Delegation, a senior official in the Pakistan Ministry of Education. It proved a wise choice. During the course of the next three days, Mr. Sharif was in constant consultation with the heads of delegations, trying to bring together their conflicting points of view and to have them agree upon a course of action for the remainder of the conference. In these efforts he was able to achieve much success. Those who had voted for the higher budget ceiling were not happy about the necessity of cutting the programme. But through Mr. Sharif's mediation they were persuaded to proceed to a critical examination of the programme to decide where reductions could best be made to bring the programme within the limits of funds that would be available in the course of the next two years.

Work of the Programme Commission

When the Programme Commission began a detailed examination of the programme and budget estimates, it had before it suggestions already made by the Budget Committee whereby savings could be effected in carrying out the programme as drawn up by the Director-General. The Administrative Commission was able to effect certain other savings, particularly in respect of the Eighth General Conference, and of the Office of the Director-General and the New York Liaison Office. The Programme Commission and the various working parties which were set up under it had to work on the assumption that only A.1 priorities could be carried out in the years 1953 and 1954 and that all A.2, B.1 and B.2 priorities would have to be deleted from the programme. They had, moreover, to look for savings of approximately 7.8 per cent in the A.1 priorities in order to bring the programme within the limits of funds available. The figure of 7.8 per cent hung like the sword of Damocles over the heads of the working parties and there were many expressions of regret that certain projects had to be abandoned because of budgetary restrictions. From our point of view, this sword was not altogether unfortunate as it helped us to press for the elimination of many projects, the value of which we doubted. By and large, no projects, which the Canadian Delegation favoured were sacrificed. Had the budgetary limitation not been present, many projects would undoubtedly have been included against our wishes.

Establishment of Priorities

A working party on the Future Programme and Development of UNESCO was set up at this conference to examine an item proposed by the United States on the "establishment of priorities". In its report, which will be referred to member states for comments to assist the Director-General in the preparation of the programme for 1955-56, the Working Party divided the activities of the Organization into three categories: (i) established services activities, i.e., the techniques and methods used in carrying out the permanent purposes or the particular programmes of UNESCO; (ii) programme activities corresponding to the present budgetary level; (iii) priorities for a programme corresponding to a higher budgetary level.

The activities of the Organization are so heterogeneous, its membership is so varied, the conceptions of its purposes are so different among various groups that the problem of defining priorities always will be arduous. European countries, for example, tend to regard UNESCO as the successor to the Centre for Intellectual Cooperation of the League of Nations; while underdeveloped countries are more interested in fundamental education than intellectual cooperation on a higher plane. There is, moreover, a certain vested interest on the part of the Secretariat in maintaining the equilibrium which has been worked out over seven experimental years among the various programme departments and their activities. Nevertheless, the General Conference has recognized the desirability of establishing priorities. The fact that certain fields have been selected for special emphasis is in line with Canadian thinking on concentration of effort and represents an achievement on which it should be possible to build in the future.

Administration of the Working Capital Fund

Against strong objections by the Canadian representative, the Administrative Commission approved advances of up to $300,000 from the Working Capital Fund for (a) requests made by the United Nations related to emergencies connected with the maintenance of peace and security, or (b) salary adjustments made necessary by fluctuations in the cost of living. We approved of the first category but spoke strongly against use of the Working Capital Fund for salary adjustments, which we thought could not be considered in any way as "unforeseen and extraordinary" expenditures. We also objected to no avail to the principle of financing the UNESCO Institutes in Germany (we spoke in favour of the Institutes' work) out of the Working Capital Fund, should it be impossible to finance them out of the regular budget. On these two matters of principle concerning the Working Capital Fund, we were as a voice crying in the wilderness: even the American Delegation, which usually kept a Congressional eye on money matters, was unable to support us.

Permanent Headquarters

Discussions regarding the permanent headquarters for UNESCO were confused half-way through the conference when the French Government announced that it must withdraw its offer of the site at the Porte Maillot on the edge of the Bois de Boulogne. Complete plans for a building had been drawn for this site, and it seemed for a short time that it would be impossible at this conference to reach any firm decision about the building. However, the French Government was pressed into making a new offer to UNESCO, and this time it proposed the site at the Place de Fontenoy near the Ecole Militaire, which originally had been offered, but had been rejected as unsuitable by the panel of five architects which is advising UNESCO in this matter. In renewing its offer of the site of the Place de Fontenoy, the French Government agreed to reimburse the Organization in the amount of $90,000 for expenses incurred in drawing plans for the other site. It also offered to withdraw the restrictions on the Place de Fontenoy site which previously had made this ground unsuitable. The French Government renewed its offer of an interest-free loan, repayable over 30 years, of approximately $6,000,000 to finance the building. Agreement in principle to acceptance of the new offer was reached, subject to final ratification at the extraordinary session in the spring of 1953, after the architects have drawn up new plans. There is every possibility that agreement will be reached in the spring and that building can proceed. If this is the case, UNESCO should have its permanent headquarters in good time for the Ninth General Conference in 1956.

Composition of the Executive Board

A long but fruitful debate was held in the Administrative Commission on the amendment to the Constitution proposed by the United States, which would have had the effect of electing to the Executive Board representatives of national governments rather than persons chosen in their individual capacities. Those in favour argued that such a change would make for closer cooperation between the Executive Board and the governments of member states in the period between ordinary sessions and in the formulation of the programme and budget estimates for future years. They hoped that through closer liaison with national governments it would be possible to avoid the type of crisis over the programme and budget which occurred in 1952. Those opposed argued that the Executive Board should be above national direction and pressures, and should serve not member states but the Organization as a whole. Canada played an active part in amending the original amendment to meet some of the objections and the amendment as finally phrased was much more acceptable. However, an Indian resolution to defer decision until 1954 gained the support of those who were opposed and those who were undecided, and was carried by a vote of 25-19-1, with 14 absent. This comparatively close vote may indicate a discouraging prospect for the future. However, there is, in our opinion, a fair chance of having the principle of the United States amendment accepted at the next General Conference if we continue to press the point with other member states between now and 1954.

Following defeat of the revised amendment, changes were made to adapt the Executive Board to a system of biennial conferences. It was agreed that the Board should be composed of 20 rather than 18 members and that each member should serve for a period of four rather than three years. One half of the Board will retire at each ordinary session so that, once interim arrangements concerning numbers have been worked out, ten new members will be elected at each ordinary session.

Elections to the Executive Board

The members who were to retire in 1953 had their term of office extended to 1954. Professor Vittorio Veronese was elected to serve out the term, until 1954, of the late Count Jacini, the Italian member. The eight new members elected to the Executive Board are as follows (in order of votes received):

Mr. Luther Evans	U.S.A.
Mr. Henri Laugier	France
H.E. Ventura Garcia Calderon	Peru
H.E. Toru Hagiwara	Japan
Mr. Luang Pin Malakul	Thailand
H.E. Dr. G.A. Raädi	Iran
Prof. Oscar Secco Ellauri	Uruguay
Prof. Jakob Nielsen	Denmark

The Yugoslav member, who had announced his resignation over the admission of Spain, was persuaded to let it stand in abeyance pending consideration by the Yugoslav National Commission and Government. Should he renew his resignation, it will be necessary to elect one more member to replace him.

Legal Questions

A Legal Committee, on which Canada served, was set up at the conference to consider the many amendments to the constitution, rules of procedure and various directives, consequent upon the adoption of a system of biennial conferences. Canada was elected to the Legal Committee for the 1954 conference, but it is not expected that the Committee will have as heavy a load as it had at this conference.

Composition of Canadian Delegations

The delegation was able to take an active part in all matters discussed at the conference. It is important that we continue to send capable representatives on the administrative and budget side. This is an essential part of the delegation's work and Canada has come to be relied upon by other delegations to produce competent personnel. It would, however, be useful if we could increase the number of programme specialists who, by background and by careful study of the programme and of their instructions, could bring an intelligent and critical approach to proposed programme activities. Mr. Page and Miss Conway were particularly helpful in this regard. If we can strengthen our delegations in this manner for the 1954 and successive conferences, we shall be able to enhance our own reputation and to help to produce a reasonable and worthwhile programme for the Organization.

Conclusions

It is interesting to draw some comparisons between the United Nations and UNESCO. A paramount factor in the United Nations is the presence of the Soviet Union and its satellite countries with the resulting basic alignment of the members of the United Nations into the pro- and anti-Soviet blocs. While this division is not clear-cut in all cases, it stands as the ultimate fact. No doubt it makes our job there particularly trying and difficult, but the existence of the division tends to draw together those countries which are not of the Soviet bloc, and to minimize to a degree the differences among them.

In UNESCO, on the other hand, there is no Soviet bloc to cause a polarization of opposition forces and we are left with those countries which, to a greater or lesser extent, we consider friendly. We must face the fact of these differences among friends and attempt to propose workable solutions. Otherwise, numbers of potentially friendly countries will adopt an aloof and cold attitude towards us which can only play into the hands of Communist propagandists.

There are a number of ways we can look at Canadian participation in UNESCO. One is that it is an organization to which we give, but from which we also receive. This has not been sufficiently recognized in Canada so far, but our scientists, our educators, our social scientists and others are beginning to realize that they can draw positive advantages from at least some of UNESCO's projects. We can also look upon UNESCO as a channel for helping the less-developed countries of the world. This is a perfectly valid reason for supporting the Organization, and is the same as that which lies behind our policy of support of the Colombo Plan.

Finally — and this is perhaps the most important — we can look upon UNESCO as one of the instruments of our general foreign policy. Whether or not we are particularly enthusiastic about some of the projects which UNESCO is carrying out, the fact remains that, particularly among the under-developed countries, UNESCO is looked upon as one means, almost the only means, of carrying out certain thoroughly desirable projects in the fields of education, science and culture. If we can approach UNESCO in an imaginative and constructive spirit, it would, we are convinced, make a very good impression on those countries of Asia and Africa which we are trying in all ways to win to our side. We are, at the moment, looked upon as a very budget-minded country, a rather niggardly country in UNESCO matters. We are either suspected or even disliked on this account even though our technical competence may be respected. The Canadian Government might well consider an increased budget for the organization and consequently an increased Canadian contribution not merely as a means of increasing UNESCO's prospects, but rather as an investment in goodwill.

In spite of these remarks, we do not wish to imply that a greater contribution to UNESCO is the only way of achieving the desirable goal of more assistance to and better understanding with the under-developed countries. We could do much more in the UNESCO field if we had a National Commission or some agency which would perform the functions of a National Commission. We could give funds more generously to the international non-governmental organizations which assist in UNESCO's work. We could provide more money for an exchange of persons programme which would fall under the aegis of UNESCO. In these endeavours, it would be easier to keep the name of Canada prominently displayed, whereas with a greater contribution to UNESCO itself, our share would tend to be lost in the general budget. Nevertheless, we think that the two are complementary, and that a more liberal use of government funds in both fields would help to further our general policy of assisting the under-developed countries in the world, particularly those in Asia and Africa.

The deeper aspects of the crisis at this year's conference arose from the clash of concepts as to the potentiality and proper purposes of the organization as seen by representatives of the less-developed countries on the one hand and of the major contributors on the other. The debate on the budget, which gave rise to Dr. Bodet's resignation, released an extraordinarily frank and even bitter attitude on the part of some delegations. They charged that the greater powers, having stimulated the hopes of the world at the end of the war concerning the peaceful and constructive role of UNESCO, were now, with their greater interest in other matters, particularly rearmament, prepared to abandon their ideals. While it is true the amount involved, less than $3,000,000, representing the difference between the Bodet budget and the one adopted, was not a significant amount, those who objected to paring the budget could not or would not see that the difference arose not just as a matter of penny-pinching, but out of the different concepts of the purposes to which UNESCO should be devoted. Thus a number of countries, including Canada, have felt that real economies could be effected in certain areas if projects were slashed or even abandoned; the funds saved in this way would be used to increase the emphasis on Fundamental Education and Technical Assistance.

If, in the immediate future, the larger contributing countries can show that they have not abandoned their interest in helping less-developed countries in the fields of fundamental education and technical assistance, then the rift emphasized by the resignation of Dr. Bodet can to a large degree be closed. There is no doubt that the United States delegation, for example, was to a greater extent than the United Kingdom delegation, determined that UNESCO must go on regardless of difficulties. To abandon it now would not only tend to disappoint, if not to embitter, peoples in South-East Asia, Africa and the Middle East, but would destroy a bridge which serves to some extent to surmount the gap between underdeveloped countries and large contributors. If this gap is widened and the bridge utterly destroyed, those who benefit most will be Communists and their allies. For this basic reason, it should be emphasized that it is in the best interests of Canada and its allies to maintain UNESCO and, if possible, to build up its prestige and activities in these fields which are of primary interest to the less-privileged nations.

CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN THE XIIIITH UNIVERSAL POSTAL CONGRESS<sup>4</sup>

The above-mentioned Congress is to be held in Brussels from May 14 to June 30, 1952. Canada has been invited to participate by the Belgian Ambassador's Note of October 6, 1951.

A letter was accordingly sent to the Deputy Postmaster General on December 14, 1951, asking that this Department be informed of the proposed Canadian representation at the Congress so that Cabinet approval could be sought. Replies dated December 15 and 28, 1951, have been received from Mr. Turnbull, stating that the Post Office Department proposes to send representatives to this Congress, and that the Canadian Delegation will be comprised of the following technical Post Office officials:

Walter J. Turnbull	Deputy Postmaster General, Head of Delegation
J.L.A. Gagnon	Director of Administration, Delegate
H.N. Pearl,	Superintendent, International Mails, Delegate
C.E. Bingleman	Secretary to the Delegation, Fonctionnaire Attaché

It was also requested that this information be communicated to the Belgian ambassador.

As you know, the accepted procedure with regard appointments to international conferences and meetings calls for the initial review by the Department of all proposals involving Canadian participation before submission to Cabinet for approval. (Cabinet Directive No. 9, attached.)+

I could take this up with Turnbull if you agree. There is merit in the suggestion that the Canadian Ambassador be on the Delegation. I presume he should be Head of it; if so Turnbull could be Deputy Head? J. L.[éger]

The Deputy Postmaster General has obviously been misled by the procedure followed by this Department in 1946 and 1947, when the attendance of Canada to the XIIth Paris Congress was being considered. The French invitation to the XIIth Congress was at that time referred to Mr. Turnbull with the added suggestion that "he would no doubt wish to consider the selection of our representatives and to arrange for their appointment by Order in Council". We asked for the names of the delegates simply for transmission to the French Ambassador.

This would also explain the direct submission concerning Canadian representation at the forthcoming Congress which was made to Cabinet by the Postmaster General, Mr. Rinfret, on December 15, 1951. Mr. Pearson has since cleared the question of the correct procedure with Mr. Rinfret. (Mr. Pick's memorandum of December 20, 1951, refers.)

I think that the officials proposed by the Post Office Department are eminently well suited to represent Canada. It would perhaps be prudent to invite our Ambassador in Brussels to be a member of the Canadian Delegation, however, since the meetings of the Congress are to be held in that City. Besides the matter of courtesy, questions of policy might warrant the attachment of a senior officer of our Embassy in Brussels as Adviser to the Delegation. This last question is of course one for the United Nations Division to look into and advise, and for this reason copy of this memorandum is being referred to them for attention.

It would therefore seem appropriate to remind Mr. Turnbull at this stage that the proposed representation of Canada at the XIIIth Universal Postal Congress should first be reviewed by this Department in accordance with Cabinet Directive No. 9, after which a Recommendation to Cabinet, joined in by both External Affairs and the Post Office Department, could be made. You may, if you agree, wish to do this informally by means of a telephone call to the Deputy Postmaster General.<sup>5</sup>

COMPOSITION OF THE CANADIAN DELEGATION TO THE XIIITH UNIVERSAL POSTAL UNION CONGRESS

A reply has now been received from the Deputy Postmaster General to our letter of January 16 on the above-mentioned subject (attached for your information).† Mr. Turnbull has chosen to ignore our reference to the necessity for a joint recommendation to Cabinet, and dealt only with the question of our Department's representation on the Delegation. On this matter, his views on the possible role of Mr. A.C. Smith of our Embassy in Brussels are few and to the point:

a) The Post Office Department officials "will be in a most direct relationship with the Belgian Postal officials, much more so than in fact any Embassy could hope to be;"

b) As regards advice on foreign policy, "the only question that can possibly come up will be the old one of membership of Communist China in the Postal Union and the Delegation will be aware of the attitude to take before leaving Canada."

I do not know Mr. Turnbull but am beginning to realize the meaning of Mr. Heeney's comments of January 4, 1952, that we "will have to employ tact and firmness." As I see it, two courses are now open to us: we can ignore Mr. Turnbull's comments, or we can consider them. If we do, we have a choice of two evils: either we persevere in having Arnold Smith included in the Delegation, or we decide to withdraw his name. If we leave Mr. Smith as adviser, his position with Mr. Turnbull as Head of Delegation may well be that of the dog in the manger. He may, of course, be consulted on "the question of the entertainment to be provided by the Canadian Delegation to Congress delegates," since Mr. Turnbull points out in his letter that "there is a field in which Mr. Smith could be particularly useful." (The conception that officers of the Department of External Affairs are experts in balancing tea cups is apparently still alive in Mr Turnbull's mind.)

On the other hand, we may decide against Mr. Smith's attendance. In so doing, however, we are recognizing implicitly that the Universal Postal Union, although one of the specialized agencies of the United Nations, is none of our business, a course of action which Mr. Turnbull undoubtedly hopes we will take. The implication of such a step would be far-reaching, as it would give grounds for a number of Government Departments to take a determined stand against our right of review of Canadian participation in the meetings of those of the Specialized Agencies with which they are primarily concerned. Even if this were not so, we would still have to fight the battle all over again should questions in which the Department might have a substantial interest crop up at future Congresses of the Universal Postal Union as happened, for instance, at the 1947 Congress in Paris. (However, Mr. Turnbull has said, albeit with tongue in cheek, that he shall be "glad to have Mr Smith's name included in the Delegation.")

The position as I see it is not an easy one about which to recommend a firm course of action. Mr. Smith is definitely too senior a man at our Embassy to be troubled with mere problems of staff and entertainment. On the other hand, General Pope, in his telegram No. 7 to us of January 10,† considers it inadvisable to use one of the junior officers on his staff as adviser to the Canadian Delegation to the Universal Postal Congress. There is this possibility, however, that our Ambassador has given too much weight to our request of January 8 for a political adviser. Be it as it may, in the views of the United Nations Division, the Department does not have a substantial interest in the discussions scheduled to take place at the Congress. Mr. Turnbull says that Mr. Smith could be useful in seeing that "we are furnished with any necessary stenographic, translation assistance as required."<sup>6</sup> We could readily arrange for this by a letter to our Embassy in Brussels. Out of pique we might even, if we are not to have one of our officers attached to the Delegation, refuse to have anything to do with the Delegation's entertainment problems, even though the Congress will still be sitting on July 1st, our national holiday. After all, considering that the reception will likely include, among the guests invited, all of the Canadian colony, besides members of the Diplomatic Corps, the imposition of some four hundred postal delegates would be rather taxing on the Embassy's resources.

You may therefore wish, if you agree, to discuss with Mr. Heeney the question of this Department's representation on the Delegation, in the light of Mr. Turnbull's comments. You will also note that the whole question of the appropriate procedure as regards Cabinet approval of the Delegation has still to be cleared, and I should be grateful for your advice as to the steps to be taken in this matter.<sup>7</sup>

I called Mr. Turnbull about the attached letter, dated January 26, on the forthcoming Congress of the Universal Postal Union.†

It has now been agreed that Mr. Smith would be attached to the Canadian Delegation. Mr. Turnbull reiterated his objection to the title of "Adviser", pointing out that this was not in use at Postal Union Conferences, and that the term for other than delegates was "Fonctionnaire attaché". I should be grateful if you could look into this. If Mr. Turnbull is right, we should agree with him. I told him we would consider the matter further.

Ottawa, February 5, 1952

DELEGATION TO THE XIIIITH UNIVERSAL POSTAL CONGRESS
DESIGNATION OF MR. A.C. SMITH.

You requested in your memorandum of February 2 that I look into the validity of Mr. Turnbull's objections to the title of adviser for Mr. Smith.

...

It has now been agreed that Mr. Smith should be attached to the Canadian Delegation. I would therefore suggest, if you agree, that we adopt with regard to Mr. Smith a procedure similar to that followed in the case of Mr. Jolliffe in 1946.<sup>8</sup> We would thus leave Mr. Smith's name out of that part of the Submission to Council requesting the Council's authority for certain named delegates to sign the Congress' documents. In the first place, Mr. Smith's presence on the Delegation was suggested merely in order for him to advise the members on any political issue which might crop up during the Congress. It never was our intention that he should sign any documents arising from the deliberations, all of which are likely to be highly technical in character.

good idea & agreeable to Mr. T[urnbull]. J. L[éger]

Mr. Smith's name would however appear in our Note to the Belgian Ambassador, informing him of the composition of the Delegation once the Governor General in Council has issued the necessary Order. The style of communication could follow that used by the Department in 1946, in transmitting to the French Ambassador the names of the Canadian delegates to the XIIth Universal Postal Congress. We would then avoid the use of the expression "fonctionnaire attaché" which, I suggest, places Mr. Smith, a First Secretary of Embassy, on the same level as Miss Bingleman, a stenographer and private secretary to a Deputy Minister.<sup>9</sup>

A Draft Submission to Council, revised in the light of the above proposal, is enclosed for your consideration. If it meets with your approval, I shall be pleased to draft the letter of transmittal to Mr. Turnbull.†

I might add that I have had occasion recently to discuss informally with one of the proposed members of the Delegation this thorny question of External Affairs representation on the Canadian Delegation to the forthcoming Congress. It has been suggested by this person, and I pass it on to you for what it is worth, that a verbal approach to Mr. Turnbull by you or by Mr. Heeney would, at this point, achieve more than the most voluminous exchange of correspondence.<sup>10</sup> Mr. Turnbull's greatest fear is that we are trying to interfere with what he considers to be his prerogative: the choice of the Canadian Delegation to a technical meeting which postal officials only should attend. This is surely not the case. What we are solely interested in, is having on the spot a senior man of this Department to advise Mr. Turnbull on any matter of political nature which may arise in the Congress' discussions. While we should not tell him so, a glance through the files will show that there is a great need for the presence of such a person on Delegations to international meetings of which Mr. Turnbull may be the Head.

Ottawa, March 1, 1952

The 13th Congress of the Universal Postal Union is called to meet in Brussels on May 14, 1952. Canada, a member since 1878 of the Universal Postal Union, now one of the specialized agencies of the United Nations, has been invited to participate.

It is agreed, after consultation with the Post Office Department, that the Canadian Delegation to the Congress should be as follows:

Head of Delegation: Mr. Walter J. Turnbull,
Deputy Postmaster General,
Post Office Department

Delegates: Mr. J.L.A. Gagnon,
Director of Administration,

Mr. H.N. Pearl,

International Mails,
Post Office Department
Mr. A.C. Smith,
Canadian Embassy,
Brussels

Secretary to the Delegation: Miss C.E. Bingleman
Post Office Department

The Universal Postal Union, when in Congress, reviews the Universal Postal Convention and its subsidiary agreements on the basis of proposals submitted in advance by members. It is, therefore, necessary to obtain from Council the authority to issue certain named members of the Canadian Delegation with Full Powers to sign all the texts arising out of the deliberations of the Congress. A Submission to Council has, accordingly therefore, been prepared<sup>11</sup> recommending that Messrs Turnbull, Gagnon and Pearl be authorized to attend and take part in the debates of the Congress, to vote on all necessary matters and to sign any agreements arising therefrom.

In accordance, also, with the Congress rules of procedure, delegates whose names do not appear in the Full Powers rank only as experts or observers. Mr. Smith will thus merely advise the other members of the Delegation on the political issues which may arise during the debates of the Congress.

If you concur with the attached Submission,+ will you please sign it. I shall then address it to the Clerk of the Privy Council for all necessary action.<sup>12</sup>

13TH CONGRESS OF THE UNIVERSAL POSTAL UNION

You signed the original of the attached copy of a Submission to Council† on the Canadian delegation to the Congress of the Universal Postal Union on March 3 and this matter was on the Cabinet agenda for yesterday morning's meeting.†

I understand that the new Postmaster General raised in Cabinet the "difficulty" of Mr. Arnold Smith of the Embassy in Brussels being a delegate to this Congress. The Prime Minister asked Mr. Coté to discuss the matter with you and then bring the subject back to Cabinet. Cabinet is meeting at two o'clock today, so Mr. Coté may approach you before then.

The Department has had considerable correspondence and some discussion with Mr. Walter Turnbull about Mr. Smith's status and role on this delegation. It was thought that the matter had been settled in the manner explained in the Under-Secretary's memorandum to you of March 1, of which copy is attached, forwarding the draft Submission to Council. It would seem, however, that Mr. Turnbull has re-opened the matter again with his own Minister. Perhaps you can satisfy Mr. Coté that it is desirable to have Mr. Smith treated as a delegate so that he may advise on any political issues that may arise during the Congress. Mr. Smith would in no sense act as an authority on postal matters and he would not have power to vote and sign documents and it is for this reason that his name does not appear in the formal Submission to Council.<sup>13</sup>

UNIVERSAL POSTAL UNION; 13TH CONGRESS, BRUSSELS; CANADIAN PARTICIPATION

10. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to discussion at the meeting of March 11th, 1952, recommended that the Canadian delegation to the 13th Congress of the Universal Postal Union, to be held in Brussels in May, 1952, include the Deputy Postmaster General and two other officials of the Post Office Department, and that these three officials be authorized, inter alia, to sign any agreements arising out of the Congress.

He had proposed that the delegation also include Mr. A.C. Smith of the Embassy in Brussels, who would provide advice regarding international political questions. It had been suggested that this would be unnecessary owing to the technical nature of the discussions but that, if Mr. Smith were to attend, he be designated "fonctionnaire attaché". This designation would not be satisfactory and he was prepared to withdraw his proposal if it were understood that the Embassy in Brussels would be consulted on any political questions arising during the meetings.

11. The Prime Minister pointed out that the Department of External Affairs had the responsibility of handling international relations and considered that the principle should be retained that delegations to international conferences normally include one or more officers of that department. If a conference were being held in a capital where there was a Canadian diplomatic mission, the mission in question should normally be represented on the delegation. In the present case, Mr. Smith should be a member of the delegation and should keep in touch with the head of the delegation with a view to attending meetings whenever the delegation was likely to require advice on international political questions.

12. The Cabinet, after further discussion, approved the recommendations of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and:

(1) agreed that:

(a) the following attend and take part in the debates of the 13th Congress of the Universal Postal Union, meeting in Brussels in May, 1952, vote on all necessary matters and sign any agreements arising from the deliberations of the congress:

Mr. Walter J. Turnbull

Deputy Postmaster General

Mr. J.L.A. Gagnon

Director of Administration,
Post Office Department

Mr. H.W. Pearl

Superintendent,
International Mails,
Post Office Department

an Order-in-Council to be passed accordingly;

(b) Mr. A.C. Smith of the Embassy in Brussels be a member of the delegation with a view to providing advice on international political questions arising during the meetings;

(c) Miss C.E. Bingleman of the Post Office Department act as secretary of the delegation;

(2) noted the comments of the Prime Minister regarding the desirability of adherence to the general practice of External Affairs participation in delegations to international conferences.

CONFIDENTIAL. IMPORTANT.

Reference: Your telegram No. 77 of June 18th (only received late this afternoon).

Following for the Minister from Ambassador, Begins: My information is that our Chief of Delegation has shown a happy knack of bringing a breath of fresh air into the Conference by means of his cogent and forceful intervention in debate but has been less tactful in his use of undiplomatic language and by occasionally and unnecessarily impugning motives of other delegations. As a matter of fact he has been as severe in his criticism of Soviet bloc delegates as he has been of any others when he has disagreed with them.

2. However this may be, it appears to me that real issue is his strong stand on question of air post transit rates which (as reported in my yesterday's telegram No. 107)† he has advocated reducing from 6, repeat 6, gold francs per ton kilometer to 2, repeat 2. His argument runs that this proposed rate is in line with existing passenger rates and in effect would merely delete subsidy element. Of course, so far as conference itself has been concerned, this is a technical matter and has perforce been so regarded by this post, even though from broader point of view the expediency of his course has obviously appeared doubtful.

3. Yesterday afternoon this Canadian proposal was defeated in Committee of the Whole by over 50, repeat 50, against (including Soviet bloc) to 8, repeat 8, in favour. Subsequently, a Polish proposal to reduce rate to 3, repeat 3, gold francs was carried in secret vote by about 45, repeat 45 to 33, repeat 33, against strong opposition by the United States which supports status quo. I understand Canadian delegation voted against, repeat against, Polish proposal.

4. International Air Transport Association, the executive of which is now meeting in Brussels, are bringing every available gun throughout the world to bear with object of causing committee decision to be reversed; and new United States Ambassador when making his first call on me today immediately broached that question and said the United States Government were also moving to obtain a new verdict. LETTER No. V-195

UNIVERSAL POSTAL UNION

Prior to the opening of the Congress of the Universal Postal Union in Brussels, in May last, we discussed with the Post Office Department the advisability of having External Affairs representation on the Canadian Delegation. The Post Office took the view that UPU dealt with technical matters with which we need not, and indeed should not, be concerned; whereas we held that External Affairs must, because of its overall responsibility for international conference work and United Nations affairs, be represented to give advice on political issues and ensure adherence to established policies in the international field. Mr. Arnold Smith of our Embassy in Brussels was eventually appointed as a member of the Canadian Delegation to the Brussels Congress.

2. The rightness of this decision was borne out by the number of political issues on which Mr. Smith was able to advise the delegation, such as the extension of UPU privileges to the territory of Somaliland under Italian trusteeship; representation of China and Viet Nam; membership in UPU of the Baltic states, Korea and Germany; postal activities of the United Nations, and other matters. Not only was the advice of an External Affairs officer useful on these and other points, but the reports prepared by Mr. Smith provided our only source of information, apart from the press, concerning the Congress and its activities.

3. This is unsatisfactory and we are concerned about knowing enough of what goes on in UPU circles so that we shall be prepared for issues of interest to us which are likely to arise and so that we may keep an eye on UPU activities with a view to coordination within the United Nations and within our delegations to various international meetings. You may be able to help provide information which will be useful for these purposes.

4. The International Bureau, or headquarters, of the UPU being situated in Berne, it would be appreciated if a member of your staff could get to know one or two of the members of the Secretariat with a view to reporting from time to time on matters of possible interest to the Department. Your Legation could, perhaps, learn in this way if any important discussions take place at meetings of the Executive and Liaison Committee (of which Canada is not a member) which meets periodically between Congresses. Dr. Hess, a Swiss national, is Director General of the UPU, and Dr. Radice, of the United Kingdom, is Deputy Director General. Either of these officials, or perhaps one of their senior assistants, might welcome the opportunity of discussing UPU problems.

5. I should perhaps underline that conversations of this nature with the Secretariat should be on an informal basis. It may be said that such liaison and reporting would be a normal function of your Legation, but as we have up until now relied on the Post Office for UPU information, we should not want that Department to get the impression that we are developing a new reporting procedure in order to eliminate cooperative action. That would be far from our purpose, and the less formal our activities are at this stage, the less chance there will be of creating inter-departmental misunderstanding. I might add, too, that this need not be a time consuming burden on your staff for it should normally be sufficient to have a talk with some member of the Secretariat only every three or four months, or at whatever intervals you deem appropriate.

6. The next Congress of the UPU is to meet in Ottawa in 1957. Canada will have certain responsibilities as host country, but perhaps more important is the fact that prior to the Congress we should have some idea of issues likely to be discussed, in order that our Delegation may be appropriately briefed. If we keep in touch with UPU developments during the interval between Congresses, our task should be much easier in 1957 than it was prior to and during this year's Congress.

7. Your assistance or comments on our suggestions will be greatly appreciated.

Ottawa, April 21, 1952

FIFTH WORLD HEALTH ASSEMBLY

The Minister of National Health and Welfare thinks that Canada should be prepared to accept membership on the Executive Board of WHO if nominated, but that we should not actively seek the nomination. If Canada is elected, Dr. Leroux of National Health will be available to represent Canada at the sessions of the Executive Board. In any event, Dr. Leroux will be available to attend each of the WHO Assemblies and will be responsible in the Department of National Health for all WHO matters. Dr. Cameron<sup>14</sup> has asked us to notify the U.K. and the U.S. of our position as the elections to the Executive Board will take place at the Fifth World Health Assembly which opens in Geneva on May 5. It would be of assistance to us at the same time to try to find out from the U.K. and U.S. what other candidates there might be for election to the Executive Board. Our Delegation in New York has been notified of Iran's candidature to succeed Turkey.

2. Preliminary discussions have already been held between officials of this Department and of the Departments of National Health and Finance to draft instructions for the Canadian Delegation to the Fifth World Health Assembly. It was agreed to recommend that this year's instruction on the question of "inactive members" should be the same as last year's. Last year you approved an instruction to the Canadian Delegation suggesting that it support any motion which would recognize the withdrawal of the ten "inactive members" of WHO (Albania, Bulgaria, Byelo-Russia, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Poland, Roumania, the Ukraine, the U.S.S.R. and Nationalist China). The Canadian Delegation was further instructed that if this course proved unacceptable to the Assembly, it might urge that "inactive members" be not assessed for 1952 and support any other measure likely to improve WHO's financial position (see para. 5 of our memorandum to you dated April 27, 1951, attached). The Fourth World Health Assembly failed to take any action to change the present situation whereby the "inactive members" are assessed, do not pay their contributions, and the "working budget" is a great deal smaller than the "paper budget".

3. Attached for your approval, if you agree, are telegrams to London and Washington informing them of our position on the question of Canada becoming a member of the Executive Board, asking for information on other candidates, and seeking the views of the U.K. and U.S. on the question of the "inactive members", at the same time reiterating the Canadian position on this subject.†

ASSIGNMENTS TO GEOGRAPHICAL AREAS: MOROCCO; TUNISIA;
FRENCH DEPARTMENTES OF ALGERIA; GREENLAND; SOMALIA

At the Fourth World Health Assembly there was a long and acrimonious debate between the French and Egyptian delegates, both in sub-committee and committee, on the issue of whether Tunisia, Morocco and possibly Algeria should be assigned to the European Regional Office or to the African Regional Office. To help bring about agreement the Canadian delegation finally offered a compromise proposal which the Director-General considered to be useful and constitutionally sound but which was never voted upon. Instead the Executive Board was asked to submit a report to this year's Assembly. Since Algeria is part of metropolitan France, while the French Government controls the foreign relations of Morocco and Tunisia, it seemed logical to the Canadian delegation that the World Health Assembly should recognize the right of France to determine the regional organization to which these countries should be assigned for the present, until such time as any of them became Members of the Organization, at which time they would presumably have the right to decide for themselves the regional group to which they wished to belong. Some held the view that on acquiring associate membership the same right might be exercised. A careful study of the constitution does not bear out this latter supposition. Article 44 (b) states that "The Health Assembly may, with the consent of a majority of the Members situated within each areas so defined, establish a regional organization...." There is no mention in the constitution of the right of Associate Members to participate in the definition of territory to be governed by a regional organization. The very fact that Associate Members are territories not responsible for the conduct of their international relations makes it illogical that they should choose to belong to a regional organization other than the one chosen for them by the metropolitan power.

Associate Members cannot attain full membership until they become independent states. On achieving independence there will be nothing to prevent the states concerned from asking the World Health Assembly to transfer them to the regional organization of their own choosing.

The Canadian delegation was informed in strict confidence during the Sixth Session of the United Nations General Assembly that the WHO Secretariat obtained a year's postponement of the vote on this issue because France had failed to make any practical arrangements for the consideration of North African health problems by the European Regional Office. Members of the Secretariat had pointed out to the French delegation that it was illogical to suggest the allocation of Morocco, Algeria and Tunisia to the European Regional Office until a practical programme had been drafted in some detail to justify the allocation. Until the World Health Assembly could be satisfied that the European Regional Office was prepared to discharge effectively the new responsibilities suggested for it, the Secretariat thought that the North African region should be serviced direct from WHO headquarters in Geneva.

As we understand it the Fifth World Health Assembly may have three alternatives to consider: (a) allocation of Tunisia, Morocco and Algeria to the European Regional Office as desired by France and recommended by the Executive Board, (b) their allocation to the Eastern Mediterranean Office as now desired by Egypt, or (c) retention of responsibility for North Africa as a whole by WHO Headquarters at Geneva.

Since we do not yet know what detailed plans have been made by France for handling health problems of Tunisia and Morocco through the European Regional Office, the Canadian delegation to the Fifth World Health Assembly might keep in mind the need for something more than a general declaration that the European Regional Organization is able to assume the new responsibility. The report of the European Regional Office for 1951 (Official Records No. 38) lists a number of "inter-country programmes" which represent efforts to meet health problems on a European level. In some cases these may be applicable to North African conditions. Is the European Regional Office so organized, however, that it can adapt the inter-country programmes to the special conditions prevailing in North Africa? How many problems peculiar to North Africa will the European Regional Office be able to plan under its 1952 to 1953 budget? Could the same programmes be provided more effectively and more economically through the Geneva Headquarters Office? These represent only a few of the questions on which the Canadian delegation may wish to obtain further information before deciding how to vote on the question of whether it would be preferable to allocate Morocco, Tunisia and Algeria to the European Regional Office or to continue to service the region directly from the Geneva Headquarters of WHO.

If it is apparent that the European Regional Office is as well fitted to handle the problems of the area as the Geneva Headquarters Office, the Canadian delegation should vote in favour of the French proposal, since Canada recognizes the right of France to determine the foreign relations of the Tunisian and Moroccan Protectorates and, of course, of Algeria.

As regards Greenland and Somalia, the Canadian delegation should vote in favour of the recommendation of the Executive Board that these two countries should be assigned to the European and Eastern Mediterranean Regions, respectively.

1. The Canadian Delegation is being instructed to support proposals for achieving stabilization of 1953 budget at 1952 level and will have some specific recommendations for reductions. The Australians have indicated to us here their strong desire for stabilization. The United States has asked us to support them in a move to stabilize the budget at the 1952 level.

2. Dr. Leroux, Head of the Canadian Delegation, will have with him six copies of the Commentary for the Canadian Delegation. Your assistance will be particularly helpful to him on the Elections to the Executive Board (Item 15). It has been decided that Canada will accept membership on the Executive Board if nominated, but that the Canadian Delegation will not actively seek nomination. The United States and the United Kingdom have been informed.

DESPATCH No. 179

Geneva, May 6, 1952

FIFTH WORLD HEALTH ASSEMBLY

The first plenary meeting of the Fifth World Health Assembly was held yesterday, with the retiring President, Dr. Leonard A. Scheele of the United States presiding. Messages of welcome to the delegates to this Assembly were presented by Mr. Gunnar Myrdal on behalf of the Secretary-General of the United Nations, Mr. Torres Bodet, Director-General of UNESCO, Mr. Swoboda, Secretary-General of the World Meteorological Organization, and Sir Herbert Bradley, Deputy Director of F.A.O.

2. At the conclusion of the introductory statements, the Assembly proceeded to establish the Committee on Credentials and the Committee on Nominations. Canada was named to the former committee and I attended a meeting of the committee which was held at the conclusion of the first plenary session.

3. On the proposal of the Acting President, the Assembly provisionally adopted the amendments proposed by the Executive Board at its ninth session relating to co-ordination with other Specialized Agencies on new activities, to supplementary items for the Assembly Agenda, to associate membership of W.H.O., to participation of observers from Non-Member States and Territories, and to voting procedures.

4. At the second plenary meeting held at 3 o'clock, the reports of the Committee on Credentials and the Committee on Nominations were approved unanimously. The Credentials Committee reported as follows:

"The credentials presented by the delegations listed below were found to be in order, thus entitling these delegations to take part in the work of the Health Assembly, as defined by the Constitution of the World Health Organization. The committee therefore proposes that the Health Assembly should recognize the validity of the credentials presented by the following delegations: Afghanistan, Australia, Austria, Belgium, Brazil, Cambodia, Canada, Ceylon, Costa-Rica, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, Ethiopia, Finland, France, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, Hashemite Kingdom of the Jordan, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iran, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Japan, Korea, Laos, Lebanon, Liberia, Luxembourg, Mexico, Monaco, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Norway, Pakistan, Panama, Philippines, Portugal, El Salvador, Sweden, Switzerland, Syria, Thailand, Turkey, United States of America, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom, Vietnam, Yugoslavia, Southern Rhodesia (Associate Member).

Notifications from Burma, Chile, Federal Republic of Germany, Peru, Saudi Arabia and Venezuela, giving the composition of their delegations state that credentials are being forwarded, and the committee therefore recommends to the Health Assembly that these delegations be recognized with full rights in the Health Assembly pending the arrival of their credentials."

5. The Nominations Committee made the following proposals with respect to the election of officers and members of the General Committee:

President of the

Fifth World Health Assembly:

Dr. Juan Salcedo, Jr.
(Philippines)

Vice-Presidents:

Dr. P. Vollenweider,
(Switzerland)
Dr. A. Bellerive,
(Haiti)
Dr. J.N. Togba,
(Liberia)

Chairman of the Committee on Programme and Budget:

Dr. N. Romero,
(Chile)

Chairman of the Committee on Administration, Finance and Legal Matters:

Dr. A.L. Mundaliar,
(India)

Members of the General Committee:

Dr. van de Calseyde,
(Belgium)
Dr. W.G. Wickeremansinghe
(Ceylon)
Dr. D. Boidé
(France)
Dr. G.A. Canaperia
(Italy)
Dr. H.B. Turbott
(New Zealand)
Dr. Karl Evang
(Norway)
Dr. M. Jafar
(Pakistan)
Dr. Melville Mackenzie
(United Kingdom)
Dr. L.A. Scheele
(United States of America)

6. You will note that the two main committees are the Committee on Programme and Budget and the Committee on Administration, Finance and Legal Matters. Prior to the consideration of the report of the Nominations Committee, the Assembly approved a resolution submitted by the Executive Board (Document E.B. 9/R/29) recommending that a Committee on Programme and Budget be established to replace the former Committee on Programme. This resolution was approved with one amendment which was submitted by the United Kingdom. The United Kingdom amendment was a compromise proposal since the Norwegian Delegation had earlier proposed that the resolution be so worded as to avoid fixing the budget before deciding on the programme. The United Kingdom Delegation suggested that the budget ceiling for 1953 be set after examination of the main features of the programme. The text of the resolution as approved by the Assembly is as follows:

“The Fifth World Health Assembly

1. ESTABLISHES a Committee on Programme and Budget, to
  - (a) review the Annual Report of the Director-General;
  - (b) study and make recommendations on the general programme of work for 1953-1956;
  - (c) recommend the budgetary ceiling for 1953 after examination of the main features of the programme;

(d) review and recommend the programme and budget for 1953 including the amounts to be devoted to each section of the total budget, and

(e) study such other items as are referred to it by the Assembly."

7. The Provisional Agenda for the Assembly (Document A 5/1) was approved. The Secretariat reported that Item 6.6.2 "Sovereign and Military Order of Malta" was being deleted, at the request of the Order.

8. All members of the delegation are working conscientiously to prepare themselves for the Committee work which is about to begin. We have also been busily engaged in meeting as many of our fellow delegates as possible.

9. I shall of course continue to report from time to time on the work of the Assembly.

DESPATCH No. 196

Geneva, May 17, 1952

FIFTH WORLD HEALTH ASSEMBLY

Reference: Our despatch No. 179 of May 6, 1952.

The Fifth World Health Assembly has now been in session for almost two weeks and it would, I think, be appropriate for me to review briefly some of the decisions which have been taken in this period. As I explained in my despatch under reference, the Assembly established two main Committees, namely the Committee on Programme and Budget and the Committee on Administration, Finance and Legal Matters.

2. Within the Delegation the division of responsibility for the work of these Committees has been as follows:

Committee on Programme and Budget:

Dr. J.T. Phair and myself

Committee on Administration,
Finance and Legal Matters

Dr. W.H. McMillan, M.P.
Dr. T.C. Routley,
B.M. Williams

I might perhaps add that the foregoing assignments to Committees have not been hard and fast since all members of the Delegation have generally tried to be "au fait" of developments in both Committees.

3. The work of the Committee on Programme and Budget has to some extent lagged behind that of the other main Committee. This is understandable, however, since the Programme and Budget Committee has had to review in considerable detail the programme and budget for 1953. The Committee has nonetheless been able to submit resolutions to the Assembly on such questions as "Recommendations to Member Governments on Vital and Health Statistics"; "Publications Programme"; "Recording and Transmission of Epidemiological Information"; "Leprosy"; "The World Position on Supply Requirements of Insecticides"; and "Production of Antibiotics and Insecticides".

4. As the final report of the Delegation to the Fifth World Health Assembly will deal in detail with the work of the Committee, I propose only at this time to comment on the debate concerning the budget level for 1953.

5. It was apparent very early in the discussions on the budget level for 1953 that there were only three Member States who were actively concerned with maintaining the budget at the 1952 level. These were: the United Kingdom, the United States and ourselves. During the discussion of this item we expressed our alarm at the proposed 1953 budget and said that, in our opinion, the overall expenditures of the Organization should be at about the level for 1952. Our statement was made very early in the debate and it was only later in the afternoon that the United Kingdom and the United States Delegations declared their positions. The United Kingdom representative explained that he was not able to vote for any budget which exceeded the effective working budget for 1952. The delegate of the United States said that, in the opinion of his Government, the best interests of the Organization, and of its members, would be served by adopting a budget calling for a total of assessments of $8,600,000.00 or the same as in 1952. He added that his Government would support a gross 1953 budget at the same level as that for 1952, namely $9,100,000.00. He explained that this would be accomplished by adding $500,000.00 of the casual income available to the assessment of $8,600,000.00.

6. The voting on the budget ceiling for 1953 clearly indicated that those Member States who were interested in maintaining the 1953 budget at about the same level as that for 1952, were in the minority. The vote was taken in three stages, as follows:

a) Vote on assessments against all members. On this item, the Committee had two proposals before it: 1) the Secretariat recommendation for an amount of $8,980,200.00; 2) the United States-United Kingdom recommendation of $8,600,000.00. The Committee approved by a vote of 33 in favour, 18 against, with 3 abstentions, the Secretariat proposal. Canada, of course, voted in favour of the United States-United Kingdom recommendations;

b) Amount of casual income available for 1953. Under this item, the Secretariat proposed the use of $852,554.00. The United States recommended $500,000.00, while the United Kingdom proposed $369,071.00. The Committee voted first on the United Kingdom recommendation which was defeated. In the immediately following vote the United States proposal was turned down. In the final vote, the Secretariat proposal was adopted. The Canadian Delegation, in these series of votes, supported both the United Kingdom and the United States proposals, but voted against the Secretariat recommendation;

c) Vote on the budget level of 1953. The Committee supported the recommendation of the Director-General for a budget level for 1953 of $9,832,754.00. Canada, along with the United States and the United Kingdom, voted against this proposal. I should perhaps explain that the discrepancy between the budget ceiling approved by the Committee in the amount of $9,832,754.00 and that recommended by the Director-General in the amount of $9,832,754.00 [sic] resulted from 1) a recommendation of the Committee on Administration, Finance and Legal Matters not to continue the publication of the "Chronicle" in Russian ($4,800.00 reduction in budget) and 2) a recommendation of the same Committee to use an additional $15,000.00 available in the Assembly Suspense Account to finance the 1953 appropriations.

7. It is our intention, when the Appropriations resolution is placed before the Assembly in plenary session, to indicate once more our opposition to a budget ceiling in excess of that for 1952. It is my understanding that the United Kingdom and the United States Delegations are planning to do likewise.

8. The Committee on Administration, Finance and Legal Matters has, I think, made considerable progress. It has, among other items, approved the supplementary budget for 1952; noted the amendments to the staff rules and the revised financial rules; dealt with the question of contributions and advances to the Working Capital Fund; agreed to suspend the Russian edition of the "Chronicle"; authorized the Director-General to draw on the Publications Revolving Fund in order to publicize WHO publications; authorized the Director-General to provide accident insurance for members of the Executive Board travelling on business for the Board; and has established a Working Capital Fund for 1953 in the amount of U.S.$3,378,811.00 plus the assessments of members who joined after May 1, 1952.

9. On the question of biannual Assemblies, the Committee approved the following resolution which was subsequently approved by the Assembly in plenary session:

"The Fifth World Health Assembly

Considering that it is not in a position to examine the proposals contained in Executive Board Resolution EB9.R53 and the documents issued subsequent to that resolution;

REQUESTS the Director-General, therefore, to communicate to all Member Governments, for consideration by the Sixth World Health Assembly, these texts and any other amendments which may be submitted by Member States, the Executive Board or the Director-General and which may be received in time to comply with the requirements of Article 73 of the Constitution."

10. The debate in the Committee on the assignment to geographical regions of Morocco and Tunisia was long and at times strained. The Egyptian Delegation submitted a resolution proposing that the whole question of assignments to geographical areas be reviewed by the Executive Board. This proposal was put to a vote and was approved with 21 in favour, 18 against and 7 abstentions. The Canadian representative voted against the proposal, along with France, the United Kingdom, New Zealand and South Africa. The United States and Australian Delegations abstained. Among our reasons for opposing the resolution was that it would prevent the Assembly from assigning any territory to a geographical region, including Greenland and Somalia, until such time as the Executive Board had completed its study. It is my understanding that the French Delegation may reopen the question when the Committee is considering its report to the Assembly on this matter.

11. As reported in my telegram No. 54 of May 15,† Canada was elected to the Executive Board, along with Brazil, Denmark, New Zealand, Iran and the United Kingdom. The result of the voting was as follows: Canada — 57; Brazil — 53; Denmark — 53; New Zealand — 50; Iran — 41; United Kingdom — 33.

12. I shall, before the end of the session, report on further developments.

FIFTH WORLD HEALTH ASSEMBLY

Reference: Our Despatch No. [1]96 of May 17, 1952.

The Fifth World Health Assembly held its final plenary session this morning. Harmony and satisfaction were the dominant notes of the meeting. The atmosphere was much more pleasant than during the two plenary sessions held yesterday when the question of the assignment of Member States, Associate Members and territories or groups of territories to geographical areas was, among other items, under discussion. As I reported in my despatch under reference the Committee on Administration, Finance and Legal Matters had approved an Egyptian resolution proposing that the whole question of assignments to geographical areas be reviewed by the Executive Board. Among the substantive paragraphs of this resolution was one authorizing the Director-General to take the necessary steps to provide services to territories not yet assigned to regions through the headquarters of the organization under the title "Region undesignated". At yesterday's plenary meeting the French delegation submitted an amendment to this paragraph as follows:

"Member States, Associate Members and territories or groups of territories for which a request for assignment to a region has been presented will be provisionally assigned to the regional organization of their choice pending the results of the study mentioned above.”

During the discussion of this item in the Committee, the Canadian delegation voted against the Egyptian proposal. When the report of the Committee on this item was under review we reserved our position since we had learned that the French delegation would likely be submitting the amendment mentioned above. It was our view that if this amendment were approved the delegation should then vote for the resolution as amended. After a heated and acrimonious discussion in the plenary session the French amendment was adopted by a vote of 23 in favour, 16 against and 11 abstentions. In the immediately following vote on the resolution as amended there were 28 in favour, 12 against with 11 abstentions. Canada supported the resolution along with the delegations of France, the United States, the United Kingdom, New Zealand and South Africa. I need not labour the point that the Middle Eastern countries, particularly Lebanon and Egypt, were most vocal in their opposition to the French amendment. These delegations received considerable support from Pakistan.

2. On the question of the participation of governments in costs incurred by the World Health Organization in connection with their Regular and Expanded Technical Assistance Programmes, the Committee on Administration, Finance and Legal Matters approved the resolution drafted by the Working Group under the chairmanship of Dr. W.H. McMillan. You will recall that the text of this resolution was contained in our telegram No. 56 of May 17.† Dr. McMillan, as Chairman of the group, submitted a report to the Committee on its work. Immediately after doing this he made the following statement:

“Mr. Chairman, now that I have officially presented the report of the Working Group of which I had the honour to be Chairman, I should like to express the views of the Canadian delegation on the draft resolution contained in the report. As I said in the Committee last week and reiterated in the Working Group, we oppose any change being made in the present policies. For this reason, Mr. Chairman, I will not be able to support the draft resolution.”

I might add that the resolution was subsequently approved by the Assembly in plenary session. We did not formally oppose the resolution at this stage since we felt that we had made our position clear both in the Committee and in the Working Group. It was evident from the discussions which took place in both these places that the majority of the delegations were in favour of some relaxation of present policies.

3. The Committee on Administration, Finance and Legal Matters also approved a resolution admitting Turkey to the European Region while provisionally suspending its activities in the Eastern Mediterranean Region. This proposal was debated at length in the Committee and was quickly becoming a springboard for a full-blown political discussion when the Turkish delegation stated that it was willing provisionally to suspend its activities in the Middle Eastern Region. As you know, the Regional Committee of the Eastern Mediterranean has not met as the countries of that region will not meet together as a Committee as long as Israel is a member. The Turkish delegation based their request for membership in the European Region on the grounds that they were not able to enjoy the full facilities of the Eastern Mediterranean Region because of the reluctance of the members of the region to hold a meeting.

4. The Committee on Programme and Budget approved an Appropriations Resolution for the year 1953 in the amount of $9,832,754. When this item was under discussion I again stated our opposition to a budget in excess of that for 1952. Similar statements were made by the United Kingdom and the United States delegations. When the resolution was put to the vote in plenary session yesterday, we opposed its adoption.

5. The most contentious item on the agenda of the Programme and Budget Committee related to the question of population. The Committee had before it three draft resolutions submitted by the delegations of Norway; Belgium, Italy and Lebanon jointly; and India. The Norwegian proposal recommended the establishment of an expert committee to study the problem; the joint resolution merely stated that the population problem did not require any particular attention on the part of WHO at the present time, while the Indian resolution requested the Director-General and the Regional Committee to consider the population question in the light of discussions in the Committee and to submit a report at a subsequent meeting of the Assembly. It was obvious during the discussion of this problem that there were many delegations who were not too anxious to stand up and be counted on any of the resolutions. During a procedural wrangle as to which resolution should be put to the vote first, the Chairman suggested that the Committee adjourn for a few minutes to enable members to digest the various resolutions. When the Committee reconvened, the representative of Ceylon said he believed that the proposers of all the motions before the Committee were prepared to withdraw them and he suggested therefore that no vote be taken but that the official records should show that the views of all delegations were noted and no decision was taken. This proposal was seconded by the United States delegation. Following this, the movers of the three resolutions expressed their willingness to withdraw their proposals.

6. At the plenary meeting held yesterday afternoon, a resolution was approved offering Dr. Chisholm an extension of his appointment as Director-General for a period not to exceed three years from July 21, 1953. Under the terms of this proposal Dr. Chisholm was asked to communicate his decision to the President of the Assembly on or before December 31, 1952 indicating whether he will accept the renewal of his contract and if so the length of the period which he is willing to accept to a maximum of three years.

7. I should also like to report that the member of the Executive Board designated by Canada was appointed as a member of the Staff Pension Committee. This Committee is composed of representatives of the executive and the administrative staff of the Organization along with two representatives from the Executive Board. In addition to Canada, Iran was appointed an alternate member. The Organization was anxious to have the Canadian member of the Executive Board on the Staff Pension Committee firstly to replace the United States member and secondly since one of the two annual meetings of the Committee is held in New York it would be more convenient for the Canadian member to attend than any of the other members of the Executive Board.

8. As you know, the Executive Board will convene on Thursday, May 29. In accordance with the decision to designate me as the person to sit on the Executive Board for Canada, I will now prepare myself for my new duties.

9. Dr. and Mrs. T.C. Routley left Geneva for London yesterday afternoon. Dr. and Mrs. W.H. McMillan departed by train this morning for Heidelberg. Dr. Phair will remain here until the weekend.

10. I should like to report that all members of the Canadian delegation to the Fifth World Health Assembly discharged their responsibilities in a friendly and co-operative fashion. We all suffered at the outset from a lack of knowledge of the procedures of the World Health Organization. I hope, however, that our initial ignorance was not too apparent. The delegation has, I think, made a useful contribution to the work of the WHO.

Ottawa, September 16, 1952

SEVENTH SESSION OF THE CONTRACTING PARTIES TO THE GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

The Seventh Session of the Contracting Parties to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade opens at Geneva on October 2nd. It is recommended that the Canadian delegation should be composed of the following officials:

Chairman:	Dr. C.M. Isbister, Director of International Trade Relations Branch, Department of Trade and Commerce
Delegates:	Mr. D.V. LePan, Department of External Affairs Mr. S.S. Reisman, Department of Finance Mr. A.R. Kilgour, Department of External Affairs, (Secretary to the Delegation)

2. The proposed agenda of the Conference comprises some twenty-five items of which the following are the ones of principal concern to Canada. The proposed agenda is attached to this Memorandum.†

(i) Balance of Payments Import Restrictions

3. The Session will be called upon to review the restrictions which countries maintain for balance of payments reasons with special reference to their discriminatory impact. If the occasion arises the delegation might express general dissatisfaction with the widespread use of restrictions for balance of payments reasons.

4. With respect to the individual country consultations which take place, it is recommended that the delegation propose that these discriminatory restrictions be examined in accordance with the following criteria; that a real and concrete balance of payments problem exists, that the restrictions applied are not excessive in relation to the magnitude of the problem, and that they are, in fact, intended merely as temporary measures pending the initiative of adequate corrective action. This is the attitude which the Canadian executive director has generally adopted in the similar discussions in the International Monetary Fund.

5. Among the restrictions which will come before the Session will be recent intensifications by Ceylon and South Africa. However, the necessary material will not be available from the International Monetary Fund. Moreover, an examination of the restrictions maintained by these two countries would almost certainly lead to an examination of the wider Sterling Area arrangements. These will be under active examination at the Commonwealth Economic Conference and it would probably be inopportune to broach these issues in the GATT forum in advance of the Commonwealth discussions. In these circumstances it may be desirable that consultations in respect to these two countries be postponed until the next session. It is recommended that the Canadian delegation pursue this aim.

(ii) Schuman Plan: (European Coal and Steel Pool)

6. At the last session a working party was established to consider the terms of a possible waiver of the rule of non-discrimination with respect to trade in coal and steel by Schuman Plan countries. While in principle we oppose restrictive regional arrangements, it is recommended that our delegation might support such a waiver in view of the political implications of the Schuman Plan. Any waiver should be drafted in specific terms so that it could not serve as a precedent for other special regional plans or arrangements which did not have similar political justifications.

(iii) United States Import Restrictions on Dairy Products

7. It is expected that the United States will be strongly criticized by a large number of countries for its continued violation of the GATT. It is recommended that our delegation should associate Canada with such criticism but reserve Canada's freedom with respect to any retaliatory action.<sup>15</sup>

(iv) Belgian Import Restrictions

8. The International Monetary Fund, in its recent review of the Belgian exchange restrictions, concluded that some relaxation by Belgium of these restrictions was feasible under existing circumstances. It asked Belgium to reconsider the necessity for the present level of the restrictions affecting dollar imports. It is considered therefore that the Canadian and United States position on this question has been greatly strengthened. It is recommended that our delegation should continue to press for the relaxation of these restrictions.<sup>16</sup>

(v) Accession of Japan

9. The Japanese application for membership in the GATT will be considered at the Seventh Session. The central issue to be decided in the GATT is whether Japan is to be invited to negotiate with a view to accession. Instructions for the delegation on this subject might best be considered in the light of discussions which are expected to take place with Japanese representatives in Ottawa prior to the opening of the Session, or which may take place with any Japanese observers at the Session. Before that time, however, it may be necessary for the delegation to take a position in the GATT discussions since it appears that the U.S. will wish to have the matter discussed early in the session. In that event the Canadian delegation might indicate that, in principle, it is not opposed to Japan being invited by the Contracting Parties to negotiate with a view to accession, if the majority of Contracting Parties are interested in having their trading relations with Japan governed by GATT. The delegation might express uncertainty as to whether Canada will in fact participate in such negotiations. At the same time it might be made clear that Canada is interested in exploring the question of whether a basis can be found for application of the GATT to trading relations between Canada and Japan. The delegation might mention that bilateral discussions are expected to take place on certain aspects of these trading relations and final Canadian attitude towards tariff negotiations with Japan and to the application of GATT to Canadian-Japanese trade can best be determined in the light of those discussions.

10. General. In view of the important matters affecting trade and commercial policy to be considered at the forthcoming GATT session it is recommended that our delegation should keep the Government informed of significant

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Memorandum, Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, Sept. 16, 1952 — Cab. Doc. 296-52)

21. The Cabinet, after discussion,

(a) agreed that the Canadian delegation to the Seventh Session of the Contracting Parties to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade to begin at Geneva on October 2nd be composed of the following officials:

Chairman:

Dr. C.M. Isbister,
Director of International Trade Relations Branch, Department of Trade and Commerce

Delegates:

Mr. D.V. LePan,
Department of External Affairs
Mr. S.S. Reisman,

Department of External Affairs,
(Secretary to the Delegation)

(b) approved the detailed instructions to the delegation, as submitted by the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, respecting balance of payments import restrictions, the European coal and steel pool, United States import restrictions on dairy products, Belgian import restrictions and accession of Japan to G.A.T.T.; it being understood that the delegation would keep the government informed of significant developments at the Geneva meetings and would seek guidance with respect to any important issues not specifically covered in the detailed instructions referred to above.

JAPANESE APPLICATION FOR ACCESSION TO THE GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

6. The Acting Prime Minister said that on July 19th, 1952, a telegram was received from the Executive Secretary of the G.A.T.T. advising that Japan had signified its desire to accede to G.A.T.T. A Canadian reply was required within 30 days unless an extension of a further 30 days was requested. Under the procedures for dealing with applications between G.A.T.T. sessions, consideration of an application would be deferred until the next regular session of the Contracting Parties if three or more Contracting Parties so requested. It was understood that the United Kingdom and France had already requested such deferment. It seemed highly probable that before August 18th a third country would have made the same request. In that eventuality Canada would not have to make a formal reply.

The Interdepartmental Committee on External Trade Policy recommended that, in the light of the forthcoming negotiations between Canada and Japan, it would be inadvisable to give Japan the impression unnecessarily that Canada was obstructing its accession to G.A.T.T. The Committee accordingly recommended that no reply be sent before a late hour on August 18th and that if, by that time, three countries had requested deferment no reply be sent at all. If three countries had not registered that view by late on August 18th a Canadian reply should be sent to the effect that the Japanese application should be deferred until the next regular session.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Memorandum, Chairman, Interdepartmental Committee on External Trade Policy, August 13, 1952 — Cab. Doc. 238-52)†

7. The Secretary of State for External Affairs agreed with the recommendations. From reports as to the position of various governments it seemed almost certain that there would be at least the minimum of three objections to use of the intersessional procedure before August 19th.

8. The Cabinet, after discussion, approved the recommendations of the Interdepartmental Committee on External Trade Policy concerning the attitude to be taken by Canada with regard to the Japanese application for accession to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade and agreed that:

(a) the Japanese application should be deferred until the next regular session of the Contracting Parties;

(b) if at least three other Contracting Parties had recorded that view by August 18th, and thereby secured the desired deferment of the application, no Canadian reply be made;

(c) if by a late hour on August 18th less than three other Contracting Parties had registered that view, a Canadian reply be sent to the Executive Secretary requesting deferment; and,

(d) no reply be given regarding Canada's willingness to participate in tariff negotiations with Japan; the matter to be left for discussion at the regular session of the Contracting Parties.

JAPANESE ACCESSION TO GATT

Reference: Your telegram No. 103 of October 2nd.

1. We have just learned the United Kingdom, through their Washington Embassy, have reached agreement with the United States on the following draft resolution for consideration by the Contracting Parties. Text begins:

The Contracting Parties: Taking note of the initiative of the Japanese Government in expressing its desire to accede to general agreement on tariffs and trades and to enter into tariff negotiations to that end: Recognizing Japan's desire to cooperate with other trading nations of the world: Recognizing further that Japan should take her rightful place in the special community of trading nations and to that end should be admitted to appropriate international arrangements: Agree that in order that further consideration can be given to the conditions and the timing under which the Japanese application should be pursued, the Intersessional Committee should make a detailed examination of the matters involved in this application and report on them. Text ends.

2. At the Commonwealth talks in London it was evident that Ceylon, India and Pakistan wished to accommodate Japan in GATT at the earliest possible date, and are unable to agree to the mere postponement of the Japanese application unless Contracting Parties at the same time give evidence of intention to take Japanese application seriously. Australia, South Africa and to a lesser degree New Zealand, informally share the view that mutually satisfactory trade relations must somehow be established with Japan, and they are interested in the possibility of special terms of Japanese accession to meet special problems of trade with Japan.

3. This present resolution needs not be interpreted as a delaying device, but rather as a method by which Contracting Parties can address themselves at an early date to the most important part of the problem, namely the study of the terms upon which Japan may eventually accede to GATT and in turn participate in the benefits. Our contacts with numerous delegations indicate that terms of eventual Japanese accession may take priority over question of invitation to Japan to negotiate with a view to accession.

This telegram repeated to London as No. 1820, October 5, 1952.

4. According to the United Kingdom, India, Pakistan and Ceylon have indicated their agreement to United Kingdom-United States text.

5. We understand that consideration is now being given in Washington to formulation of possible terms of reference for Intersessional Committee. This subject is also being considered informally here in Geneva. There may well be explicit references to such matters as wage rate and costs of production in Japan. There may be a reference to Article XXXIII under which Japan could be consulted with regard to the terms of her accession. We are inclined to support this latter move which would undoubtedly be welcome to Japanese without necessarily prejudicing the outcome of the consultations.

6. At first plenary meeting the Contracting Parties agreed that Japanese observers be admitted.

7. Please repeat to London.

JAPANESE ACCESSION TO GATT

Reference: My telegram No. 101 of October 4th.

Please repeat London attention Bull and Deutsch.

1. Japanese item is now scheduled for plenary session on Friday since Thorp wishes to participate leaves Geneva on Sunday. Delegations principally concerned are approaching agreement along the lines of text sent you in my telegram under reference. The preamble has now been extended to take note of Article XXXIII, repeat XXXIII, which provides that a government not a party to the general agreement may accede to it on terms to be agreed between such governments and contracting parties. An additional final sentence will probably read as follows: "In the course of this examination the committee may seek the views of the Japanese Government."

2. This revised text seems to us to be satisfactory and appears to represent largest measure possible of common agreement at this session. In view of the difficulties encountered in establishing present text it should be explained that it may be very difficult for us to secure further amendments to it. If substance of resolution is not, repeat not, satisfactory, we should receive advice prior to 3 p.m. Geneva time Friday, October 10th. If we do not, repeat not, receive further instructions by that time, we shall support resolution to avoid creating an impression of hostility to Japan.

Repeated to London as No. 1843.

3. Because we have been puzzled by American acquiescence in present resolution, I approached Thorp privately to enquire whether the United States is now supporting Japanese application less strongly than hitherto. This led to an interesting discussion in which Thorp's remarks confirm what we had suspected. Thorp explained that basic United States policy of protection changed on Japanese question. On the other hand, he is very optimistic that a new Democratic administration might in its first year so liberalize the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act as to enable the United States to go farther in tariff reductions than would be possible if negotiations were to take place with Japan at the present. At the very least he would hope to get rid of this point and an attempt would be made to modify traditional balance of reciprocal negotiations by introducing new principles of unilateral tariff reductions to be used in certain circumstances. (Parenthetically Thorp remarked that a Republican administration might just about hold the line of present commercial policy.) He had told the Japanese that the United States might be able to do much more for them in negotiations to be discussed hence than they could do today. Thorp mentioned to me the absence of any widespread public demand in the United States for expanded trade with Japan. He said the United States support of present resolution is a "low pressure" operation in the direction of eventual Japanese accession.

4. The United States does not, repeat not, wish to push so hard as to impel countries like the United Kingdom and France to take refuge in redeclarations of intention, resorting to Article XXXV. Thorp understands and accepts the point of view of the United Kingdom outlined in the following paragraph.

5. United Kingdom representatives have explained to several delegations their desire to avoid presenting the Beaverbrook press with a new basis of support for preferential trade by raising Japanese issue sharply at this time. They feel that the United Kingdom Government has been fairly successful in shelving some of the more extreme proposals for protected trade. Any commitments by the United Kingdom with regard to trade with Japan might raise the clamor of the Opposition which the United Kingdom Government hopes to avoid. In this connection Frank Lee told me in London that six months delay would mean a great deal to the United Kingdom at this time.

6. Hagiwara, head of Japanese Observers, tells me they would have preferred to proceed more rapidly but in the circumstances are satisfied with the text as it now stands. Within the period of four years referred to in Article XII of the Peace Treaty, Japan hopes to negotiate agreements with many countries with regard to trade and also with regard to establishment, navigation, immigration and so forth. They understand the length of time required to arrange multilateral GATT negotiations but they hope nothing will delay completion of all their negotiations beyond the four-year period. We explained to him that the contracting party must in any event face the question of status of present schedules and also of future tariff negotiations prior to the end of 1953 and we assured him that Canada has no, repeat no, intention of creating delays.

7. We asked Hagiwara whether Japan still wishes to conduct bilateral trade discussions with us or whether they would prefer to replace these with discussions which may now take place under GATT. He said Japan still wishes to meet us bilaterally to ascertain our intentions under Article XII of the Peace Treaty and to determine in this way Japan's obligations towards Canada. He felt these discussions should logically precede negotiations which might take place later under GATT.

JAPANESE ACCESSION TO GATT

Reference: My telegram No. 101 of October 4 and No. 105 of October 8.

Please repeat to London for Bull and Deutsch.<sup>19</sup>

Following from GATT delegation, Begins:

1. Japanese observer appeared before plenary session on October 10th and his appeal was well received by a number of delegations which spoke in reply. In general Japanese application is being taken quite seriously and there seems to be a widespread desire to study the best means of dealing with special difficulties of Japanese accession to which several delegations referred. Text of our Canadian statement is contained in immediately following telegram. The resolution conveyed to you in our telegram under reference will be presented by Chairman at a plenary session on October 14th and will probably be approved. It may be helpful to outline some of the problems and alternatives as we see them.

2. Hagiwara, the Japanese representative, is interested whether it would be possible for Canada and Japan to negotiate tariff bilateral in near future and at a later date fit the results into general pattern for Japanese tariff negotiations for accession to GATT.

3. We have not, repeat not, yet reacted to this suggestion which was put up merely as a general proposition for discussion. It seems probable Hagiwara will find an occasion to return to this subject. Since we had planned our bilateral discussions in Ottawa with Japanese to deal merely with customs valuation and with Most Favoured Nation treatment it would seem premature at this time to introduce subject of tariff negotiations.

4. As explained earlier we understand from Thorp that Japanese seem to be reconciled to idea that it is in their own interests to accept a delay of possibly a year in their tariff negotiations with United States. We propose to explain to Japanese that United States is a principal supplier under many of the Canadian tariff items in which Japan has an interest and that Japan would do better to wait for multilateral tariff negotiations in which United States also would participate. We can explain also that a government acceding to GATT is negotiating for benefit of all tariff reductions which were accorded one another at an earlier date by existing contracting parties. This would make it difficult for Canada and Japan to conclude bilateral tariff negotiations in advance of multilateral negotiations for accession.

5. On the other hand, Japan might well be prepared to negotiate in Ottawa special valuation provision or escape clause to apply reciprocally between Canada and Japan, each country otherwise according to the other Most Favoured Nation treatment. Such an arrangement could apply pending eventual Japanese accession to GATT.<sup>20</sup> In negotiations for Japanese accession to GATT we may later find other countries interested in adopting such special valuation provisions of a continuing nature. The resolution now before contracting parties is written to prepare the way in some measure for that source of action. For us to proceed along this line might well be to blaze the trail for general action by the contracting parties at a later date.

6. However, in this connection, it is relevant that of the non-Asiatic GATT countries none of them seem to contemplate bilateral negotiations with Japan in near future either with regard to Most Favoured Nation treatment or with regard to tariff rates. Several of them were approached as we were under Article XII of peace treaty but have given us the impression that they are still studying their replies. Having in mind substantial differences between Canadian Most Favoured Nation tariff rates and general tariff if we negotiate a Most Favoured Nation agreement with Japan in the near future we would be in position for a year or possibly two of being only non-Asiatic country which is making substantial tariff concessions to Japan.<sup>21</sup> While we do not, repeat not, wish to over-emphasize the importance of this fact which has become clear at this session it may be a reason for proceeding a little more slowly than had been contemplated earlier.

7. Hagiwara said Japanese wish to come to Ottawa to determine their responsibilities under Article XII of peace treaty by (group corrupt) what treatment Canada intends to grant to Japan. He went on to say Japan will not, repeat not, in general, be able to extend Most Favoured Nation treatment even for brief period to the countries which do not, repeat not, reciprocate. Although

Negotiate immediately.

don't negotiate for immediate application.

he did not, repeat not, explicitly refer to Canada there was no doubt of what he meant. I asked him direct at that point whether Japan would in fact penalize Canadian exports if Canada failed to extend Most Favoured Nation treatment to Japan during the period in which Japanese accession is under active consideration in GATT and while Japan is obtaining necessary material and foodstuff from Canada. His reply was a bit evasive and in view of language difficulty I am not, repeat not, perfectly sure that he got the point.

8. As a (group corrupt) on last paragraph our position at this session has included us amongst group of countries which are relatively speaking friendly and well disposed towards establishing satisfactory trade relations with Japan. It would seem short sighted for Japanese to adopt strong punitive measures against us in these circumstances. You may wish to consider whether, in Geneva, we might try to tell the Japanese quite frankly that Canada can not, repeat not, get very far ahead of the United States in commercial policy toward Japan and that we are already according Japan equally good if not better tariff treatment than United States. We might suggest that Ottawa discussion be used to try to reach agreement on terms under which Most Favoured Nation treatment might eventually be extended. We could offer help to Japanese by trying to get other GATT nations to accept similar terms in connection with the Japanese accession to GATT thus avoiding widespread use of Article XXXV. We could assure Japan of our desire to build up cordial trade relations and counsel them in their own interest not, repeat not, to start to raise trade barriers against us during this period. We could put this forward as a personal assessment of what kind of negotiations our government might now be prepared to enter into. If it proved wholly unacceptable to the Japanese, it would be possible later in Ottawa to move somewhat further along the line of Most Favoured Nation treatment at an early date. Ends.

Mr. Chairman:

My delegation has listened with great interest to the statement made by the representative of the Government of Japan. This is the first occasion upon which the Japanese observer has addressed the contracting parties. The Canadian delegation welcomes his presence at this session and his participation in this meeting.

2. The contracting parties have been notified of Japan's desire to accede to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. My delegation is interested in exploring the question of whether a basis can be found for the establishment of mutually acceptable trade relations between our own country and Japan. We are hopeful that such a basis can be found.

3. My delegation considers it desirable that the contracting parties should adopt some effective procedure for the consideration of this case. We understand the desire of the Government of Japan to avoid delay in establishing the commercial agreements by which its trade with other countries will be conducted. Japan is an important country in world trade. It is desirable, therefore, that the contracting parties study all aspects of this case with care so that generally acceptable conclusions may be reached. The problems raised by the Japanese application are numerous and complicated so that even with the most expeditious procedures it may still take some time for the contracting parties to reach their conclusions. The Canadian delegation, for its part, is prepared to participate in an examination of the special problems raised by the Japanese application.

4. It may be hoped that the Chairman, with his customary ability, will be able to propose some satisfactory method of procedure. My delegation has taken it for granted that a working committee, when established, will seek the views of the Japanese Government in attempting to determine mutually acceptable international trading arrangements with Japan. In this connection I should like to draw your attention, Mr. Chairman, to Article XXXIII of the General Agreement in which it is provided that a government not party to the General Agreement may accede to it on terms to be agreed between such government and the contracting parties.

5. Once again, Mr. Chairman, I would like to make clear the interest and pleasure with which we have heard the Japanese representative. Text ends.

JAPANESE ACCESSION TO GATT

Reference: Your telegram No. 111 of October 14.

Following for GATT Delegation, Begins: We agree that we would not consider entering into bilateral tariff negotiations with Japan in advance of general tariff negotiations which must, in any case, precede Japanese accession to GATT. Accordingly, it would be appropriate for you to speak to Hagiwara along lines of your paragraph 4 in the event that he raises this question again.

2. If we understand train of argument in your paragraphs 5-8 correctly, you would suggest that we discuss basis on which most-favoured-nation treatment might eventually but not immediately be accorded by us to Japanese goods. In interval between termination of your talks with Japanese in Ottawa and Japan's accession to GATT present tariff treatment of Japanese imports would continue on understanding that Canada would seek to take lead in facilitating Japanese accession to GATT on basis of formula agreed upon for bilateral arrangement, and that Japan would not apply punitive surtax on Canadian products.

3. While we would not wish to minimize validity of premise set out in paragraph 6 of your telegram, we wonder if any other non-Asian country (with exception of United States) enjoys such a substantial surplus in its trade with Japan as Canada. Moreover, while it is true, as you suggest in your paragraph 8, that our general tariff rates are probably as good, if not better than United States single column tariff rates, fact remains that we are discriminating against Japanese imports whereas United States is not.

4. Japanese have now indicated informally that they are likely to be ready to initiate bilateral discussions with us in about a month's time. They are still working on draft terms of agreement which they intend to submit for our consideration. Your suggestion as to position it might be appropriate for us to take at Ottawa discussions has been the subject of careful study by departments primarily concerned. Consensus of views is that it might be preferable at this stage to await developments during forthcoming discussions before giving any indication of Japanese along lines proposed in your message.

5. In reaching this conclusion we had in mind two main considerations. First, we were not sure if it would be desirable for us to "blaze trail" for Japanese accession to GATT, especially when, as your messages have made clear, United States' attitude toward admission of Japan has undergone some modification. Secondly, we would not wish to give impression that Canada is now seeking to draw back from original indication we gave to Japanese Ambassador here to the effect that we were prepared to place our trading relations on most-favoured-nation basis if and when bilateral agreement could be reached. You will agree that atmosphere of impending bilateral discussions might well be soured if we now conveyed impression to Japanese that general reluctance of other countries to negotiate with Japan or to accommodate Japan in GATT had induced us to alter original basis of negotiations.

6. Japanese have expressed their appreciation to us for statement embodied in your telegram No. 112 and general position you have taken in Geneva. In these circumstances we are particularly anxious not to forfeit advantage of goodwill already gained.<sup>23</sup> Ends.

Extract from Letter from Chairman, Delegation to Seventh Session of Contracting Parties to General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

[Geneva,] October 12, 1952

Dear Dana [Wilgress],

This is a personal letter about things at the Seventh Session, because I know you are interested. It is not intended, of course, as a substitute for official messages. Please do not feel under any obligation to reply.

We have been busy, indeed, for the first ten days — and nights. The session is more largely attended than other recent ones. The substance of the issues is more important than we had supposed in advance. As a result, our Delegation of four is rather thin on the ground. Five would have been better. With LePan and Reisman, the quality of the team is very high and we can take on anything that arises. Kilgour is fitting in well, too, and being very useful.

Most of the larger issues at this Session have by now been pretty well settled in principle — Japanese accession, Belgian import restrictions, United States restrictions on dairy products, and the general approach to the balance of payments consultations.

We have had several talks with Hagiwara, the Japanese representative, and our two delegations are on good terms. Hagiwara is accompanied by no less than fifteen associates who extend in meetings as far as the eye can see. We have already sent messages to you about Japan. I am going to draft one more today.

Our position on Japan seems to fit quite neatly into the general pattern of the other countries. We have made friends with all the Asiatics here by our view that, even if there are special difficulties to be faced, we must live and trade with Japan and should, therefore, try to find mutually acceptable agreements on which to conduct trade. All the delegations seem anxious to avoid forcing Japan into an aggressive regionalism by excluding her from G.A.T.T. On the other hand, there is no immediate sense of urgency about admitting her. The Japanese themselves seem to accept the fact that their application to G.A.T.T. in advance of this session may have been premature.

In discussions with other delegations, we have put into circulation the idea of meeting special problems of the various countries by writing appropriate safeguards into the eventual terms of accession of Japan, to be applicable for perhaps a limited period of years, and Japan otherwise to participate fully in G.A.T.T. This approach has taken hold and seems to be pretty generally acceptable in principle.

We are very close to agreement with the Belgians on their import restrictions. The Americans and ourselves have had some exasperating meetings with the Belgians but our relations have been harmonious throughout. The Belgians have now taken a text back to Brussels, by which they will announce a list of relaxations to take affect in the near future. They are prepared to have us express views on particular items we wish to be included in the list. They will imply strongly that this is just a first step, unless their position deteriorates. If and when the Belgian Government says they will accept the text, to which we have not committed ourselves as yet, we shall send it along. The United Kingdom does not seem to be at all worried about this solution, as yet, at any rate. You will remember that last year the United Kingdom supported the Belgian restriction more strongly than the Belgians did.

We have not yet reached agreement with other delegations on what to do in the Contracting Parties about the United States restrictions on dairy products, but this should not be too difficult. The Americans have removed or greatly increased the quotas applicable to some types of cheese and they have increased all the quotas by a nominal 15%. They have three quota periods in the year, however, and by making the whole of the 15% available for the current 4-month period, the effective rate of increase is really 45%. If things go well, they will try again to get rid of the remaining quotas early next year.

We had some troubles with the United States on the balance of payments consultations, but these seem to have been fairly well overcome. The Leddy mission told us in Ottawa of their interest in laying a greater emphasis on trade aspects and upon general techniques of import control in the consultations this year. We agreed and even approved of this idea, provided it was intended merely to change the emphasis, and not to divert attention from the basic questions of whether countries are entitled to have any quantitative restrictions and, if so, whether their restrictions are excessive.

We were given to understand that the Americans wished to refer to commodities to increase their own information about techniques of import controls and to provide concrete examples of general principles. What the Americans did not tell us, in Ottawa, was that they were sending official messages to several countries in advance, and in one or two cases rather brusque messages, with lists of products and a stiff notice that the United States would utilize the balance of payments consultations to have a searching and detailed discussion of these commodities.

This approach was evidently established carefully and interdepartmentally in Washington and the Department of Agriculture has sent three people here to the balance of payments working party. One of these is our old friend, Fred Motz. State Department provides the spokesman and George Bronz, the single Treasury representative, looks most unhappy and keeps quiet.

This new American approach threatened at first to be difficult to change, and it certainly threw the other delegations into a turmoil. For the other exporting countries, it raised the question of whether they should also submit lists. The importing countries were perturbed at the possibility of these lists mushrooming into hundreds of items. American prestige was weakened by the appearance on their lists of a number of inconsequential items which have obviously been the subject of representations to the State Department and have been included on their lists for parochial political reasons. The important items were all fruits and vegetables and, of course, these latter are highly important to us.

I finally went to Willard Thorp and referred in very general terms to our hope in Canada that it might be possible before long for everybody to take a new look at extending multilateral trade, removing restrictions and doing something about convertibility. I told him I thought it would be disastrous to create the impression that North American concern about these large problems is focussed on a desire to get rid of a few surplus agricultural products overseas. I told him I thought this would be the consequence of pursuing the course they were proposing in the balance of payments consultations. Willard picked up this point and proceeded to discuss it. I think he was already a bit embarrassed by the whole situation they had created. I feel sure Willard had not himself been aware previously of the sharp text of the note they sent to South Africa. I don't think any of the Americans had really thought their way through all the implications in advance of making their new proposals.

The upshot was that Willard made quite a good statement in the Contracting Parties and their questions about commodities are to be "fitted in" to the balance of payments consultations in a natural way, and without too much fuss. This seems to be in accordance with the sort of procedure which we had envisaged and are well prepared to follow.

Reisman is carrying the balance of payments working party as his major job although he is, of course, getting into numerous other things in addition. The United Kingdom made a good statement yesterday in the working party, in which they were quite objective in describing their own situation, in which they mentioned the harmful effects of import controls, and referred to the importance of internal policies to rectify the underlying problems. Most of the countries wish merely to retain previously formulated positions in the balance of payments consultations this year, so there is not much in the way of new doctrine.

The waiver for the new European Coal and Steel Community is one of the most important items at this Session. The subject matter is new to us and very complicated, and LePan arrived at just the right moment to represent us on this working party. He is succeeding admirably in helping to formulate the problems of a waiver under the G.A.T.T. and, at the same time, is taking a friendly, sympathetic attitude towards this new European plan. The Europeans themselves are very excited about it and they have all sent special people to deal with this item. As you may know, Spirenborg has left the Netherlands Government to serve on the High Authority, as has Cecil Weir from the United Kingdom.

There is a considerable amount of talk about the need for an important session next year. Some are referring to it already as a constitutional session, although I am not perfectly clear on what that is supposed to mean. Sometimes the talk takes the form of asking what do we do three years after Torquay. Sometimes it takes the form of asking whether the present agreement can contain Japan or whether there will be a widespread withdrawal of bound items in the face of Japanese accession. There is some speculation also about reconsidering some of the basic provisions, if the United States Government should adopt a new and more liberal approach to commercial policy next year. All of this is very hypothetical, but, added to the Schuman Plan, I think it is the underlying reason why there is a good deal of bustle and interest attaching to this Session. As an example, even the innocuous item of special Italian customs treatment for Libyan products provoked a surprisingly serious debate on the principles of tariff preferences.

Parenthetically, the steam has all gone out of the European tariff equalization issue. Perhaps the Europeans are waiting to see what the United States will do next.

Melander has asked me quite seriously how we feel about holding next year's session in Canada. I promised to return to this discussion with him. I don't know whether our Government would want to have it in Canada in an election year. If we were certain that the next Session would be able to assemble in the light of brave new commercial policies in the United States, I suppose we would be more interested. It would certainly be helpful to receive any guidance you might care to give on this one. You will remember that last year we said we thought regular business sessions should be held in Geneva.

I have been a bit busier myself at this Session. In addition to our own Delegation's business, I have been asked to take on the chairmanship of one of the three important working parties, this being the one to deal with all of the cases of commercial complaints and difficulties. There are seven or eight such cases, some of them quite interesting. It is expected that this working party will be appointed and start work this week.

I have also been asked informally to try my hand at mediating between Pakistan and India on a difficult problem which has arisen. It is a problem to which an early solution is very desirable. I have undertaken to see them both to try to find what common ground there is. Pakistan has imposed export control on jute going to India and it seems likely to cause immediate damage and endless friction unless something can be done.

Wyndham-Whyte remarked that when you were Chairman you would have resolved this one yourself by interviewing the two delegations, but the present Chairman is not good at this sort of thing.

Wyndham-Whyte is doing a first class job, as always. Suetens is spokesman for the European countries on the Schuman Plan and always speaks of you, as, in fact, do most of the delegation heads. . . .

This has turned into a longer letter than I initially intended. I shall send a copy to Bull and Deutsch in London.

Yours faithfully,

CLAUDE ISBISTER

Geneva, November 4, 1952

Dear John [Deutsch],<sup>24</sup>

The session is now in its wind-up stage and I thought you might be interested in some of the things that have kept us busy here for the last month. You have no doubt seen our despatches and telegrams on the various detailed issues, so that there is no need to repeat them here. There are, however, a few observations I would like to make which have not been the subject of reports home.

You will recall that most of us felt this Session would not be of great significance, having in mind the position of the United States and the United Kingdom, as well as the deterioration in the trade situation generally. With the exception of the discussion concerning Japan this has, in fact, been true. At the same time, it is perhaps worth pointing out that, both from the point of view of representation, and the agenda, this Session has shown quite a surprising vitality. Countries both large and small appear to be taking the agreement seriously, and look to it to protect them against many of the day-to-day abuses which are bound to arise in international trade. The agenda included quite a few complaints affecting internal taxes, tariff increases and trade restrictions of one kind and another, which have in large measure been resolved to the satisfaction of all parties concerned.

A very good report from Reisman. J. D[deutsch]

There has been little formal discussion of the need for a general review of the agreement, but it is fair to say that the consensus of opinion is that such a re-examination in the not too distant future is necessary. On the other hand, most delegations would agree that the present agreement would provide a suitable point of departure, to be modified in the light of actual post-war experience. Very few people would suggest that we really have to make a fresh start.

The consultations on trade restrictions and discrimination maintained for financial reasons did not prove to be as controversial on this occasion as they usually are. The fact that the difficult consultations, including South Africa, Southern Rhodesia and New Zealand were postponed, had something to do with it. Then too, the attitude of the consulting governments was more helpful than in the past. The Australian position seemed to reflect their new attitude. The United Kingdom was represented by an able forward-looking Treasury official, Edgar Jones, who probably belongs to that group of United Kingdom officials who are still wedded to liberal economic doctrine.

You will be pleased to hear that the consultations carried out at this Session included a frank discussion of the relationship between internal fiscal and monetary policies and exchange difficulties. Surprisingly enough, countries were quite prepared to discuss this aspect of the problem, in the context of alternative corrective measures, even though the G.A.T.T. is fairly specific on the sovereignty of national governments in the matter of domestic policy. We have not yet completed the reports on quantitative restrictions and discrimination, but unless there are drastic revisions in this next few days, it is fairly certain that the reports will reflect in large measure the views which we have been expressing in the Fund and elsewhere.

We had some difficulty in the early stages of the consultations in getting the committee to focus properly on the essential issues. The United States had envisaged using the consultation procedure to make representations to the consulting countries with respect to certain specific commodities which had been the subject of complaints in the United States. In our view, this would have distorted the basic purpose of the exercise, and would have left the impression that the United States had now accepted discriminatory trade restrictions as a permanent feature of trade policies. We finally succeeded in getting the Americans, with the help of Willard Thorp, to see our point of view. I gather that their recent instructions from Washington are much closer to our position, because they have joined us in pressing for the kind of report that deals with fundamentals.

In essence, we expect that the final report will say two things. Firstly, that restrictionism does not provide a solution to exchange problems. Secondly, that in searching for solutions which go to the root cause of their difficulties, countries would be well advised to take a closer look at internal policies which have led to inflation. This is of course old stuff as far as our thinking is concerned. Insofar as the report is adopted by the Contracting Parties, however, and represents the views of all the participating governments, it carried more weight than the views of one or two governments.

Perhaps the most significant achievement at this Session, from the Canadian point of view, is the undertaking by Belgium to relax its dollar restrictions as a first step in the return to a régime of complete freedom from restrictions. This looks good on paper but I think it would be premature to "count our chickens" at this stage. The discussions revealed that Belgium's partners in the E.P.U., and particularly France and Holland, will make strenuous efforts to keep the Belgians from going very far or very fast towards these objectives.

Insofar as the Japanese application for accession is concerned, perhaps the most important fact is that the United States is proceeding more cautiously than we had anticipated. The action taken here is, in my view, no more than a polite postponement of the real issues. It is most unlikely that anything will emerge on the G.A.T.T. front for some considerable time to come. At the same time, I think we succeeded in building up considerable good will with Japan so that any bilateral discussions which we undertake should in no way be prejudiced by developments in the G.A.T.T.

Concerning United States restrictions on dairy products, you are of course aware that the United States administration has introduced a number of relaxations in the last month or so. We were given to understand that if these relaxations do not lead to serious complaints from the United States dairy interests further relaxations will be forthcoming in the not too distant future. Holland was the only country which announced actual retaliation and, incidentally, the Dutch action should make it possible for us to sell a little more wheat flour in the coming year. You are also aware that Australia and New Zealand may announce measures of retaliation within the next few months. Australia, I expect, will approach us formally on the question of restoring the margin of preference on dried fruits. You may expect to hear more about this at the London Conference.

In a more personal vein, the delegation has had little respite since the Session commenced. By any standards, we are a small delegation indeed, ranking with Ceylon and Cuba in numbers, and well below delegations such as Australia which have as many as ten members. This has meant a fairly continuous burden of work, since, as you know, Canada generally is represented on almost every working party. As usual, we have also been performing certain functions which go somewhat beyond the direct Canadian interest. For example, Claude Isbister is the Chairman of the Panel on Complaints which is handling a number of important commercial policy complaints, including a pretty sticky one between India and Pakistan. I was appointed Chairman of the Working Party on Applications under Article XVIII for Economic Development. Doug LePan has been helping the Europeans settle their differences on the Schuman Plan waiver as well as cover our front on the proposal for the levelling of tariffs. Incidentally, the tariff scheme has not raised much interest at this Session. I am inclined to think that the scheme will be stillborn.

If all goes well, we expect the Session to terminate, at the latest, November 11th.

Yours sincerely,

SIMON REISMAN

INTERNATIONAL RED CROSS CONFERENCE

1. We have known, ever since we agreed to this conference being held in Toronto this summer, that Communist governments and governments of states we do not recognize, would be invited. Both the Germanies, and both the Koreas are now, we learn, to be invited. We can, if we choose, protest against any of these, although our opinion has not been asked.

2. The Canadian Red Cross has asked our advice about the Formosa Government. The Communist Chinese Government has already been invited through this Department. The Standing Commission of the Conference at Geneva has asked the Canadian Red Cross its view on the advisability of inviting also the Nationalist Chinese Government. Apparently all members of the Standing Committee are being polled and the decision will go by a majority vote of those polled. The same question is being asked about the Chinese Red Cross Society which has its headquarters in Formosa.

3. We have so far taken the position that the Red Cross people are themselves the ones to decide who should be invited to the Conference. We think that if we once interfere, we may well be drawn into numerous disputes. Our view within the Department has been that governments and societies of any country in which hostilities are apt to occur, or whose forces are apt to be engaged in hostilities, should be invited, if eligible. Hence, for example, we did not protest the invitation to Communist China.

4. If we follow the same principles, we should not object to North Korea being invited, even though we branded North Korea as an aggressor. I therefore recommend that we raise no objection regarding North Korea, and that we transmit the invitation, when received, through appropriate channels. I must, however, remind you that Torontonians and some other Canadians may not like this, and that you are yourself a member of the General Committee of the Conference.

5. As to Nationalist China, it would politically be more comfortable for us if that Government were invited. It presumably has no doubts of its own eligibility. It will feel itself slighted if left out. It will, perhaps, complain to this Department. An invitation to Nationalist China would also fall within our policy of having all potential belligerents attend. Nevertheless, I would recommend that we adhere to our rule — that is, we should decline to advise the Canadian Red Cross Society. If you agree, I shall cause the Canadian Red Cross Society to be told orally that we do not think this is a question appropriate to be addressed to the Canadian Government. If pressed for “unofficial” advice, we could add, “off the record” that we certainly had no objection to the Formosa bodies being invited.<sup>25</sup>

XVIIITH INTERNATIONAL RED CROSS CONFERENCE

Reference: Your telegram No WA-964 of April 9.†

On April 30, the Minister received Mr. H.H. Leather, Chairman of the Executive Committee of the Canadian Red Cross Society, Dr. W.S. Stanbury, the National Commissioner, and Mr. Cuthbert Scott, the Special Representative in Ottawa of the Canadian Red Cross Society.

2. The various problems arising out of the forthcoming Conference in Toronto were discussed and the Red Cross representatives agreed that the Department's concern over the presence of the Chinese communists and the North Koreans might be lessened by extending an invitation to the Chinese Nationalist Government in Formosa. They agreed to make a recommendation to this effect to the Standing Commission of the Conference in Geneva.

3. The Standing Commission has now approved the issuing of an invitation to Nationalist China and the Minister has written to Mr. Leather confirming the

I would certainly resign from any committee of the conf[erence] if North Koreans were invited to this conf[erence] and the Chinese nationalists were not. provisional understanding at the April 30 meeting that there will be no change in the policy of co-operation so far followed by the Department in regard to the Conference.

4. This means that invitations have reached or will reach the communist authorities at Peking, the Nationalist Chinese Government in Formosa, the North Korean authorities, the South Korean Government, as well as the Government of West Germany and the authorities in East Germany. This information you may wish to transmit to the State Department.

5. I may add for your information that the Canadian Red Cross Society expects the invitation sent to the U.S.S.R. and its satellite states to be accepted and also expects a mixed official — Red Cross delegation — to be sent by Communist China. The Canadian Society does not expect North Korea to attend, but on that point I have no other information. These details you may pass to the State Department at your discretion.

INTERNATIONAL RED CROSS CONFERENCE; 18TH SESSION, TORONTO, JULY-AUGUST, 1952; GOVERNMENT REPRESENTATION

25. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said the 18th Session of the International Red Cross Conference would be held in Toronto between July 23rd and August 9th, 1952. It would be attended by the International Committee of the Red Cross, representatives of the League of Red Cross Societies (the Canadian Red Cross Society acting as host) and representatives of many of the governments with which Canada had close associations. As the session would not be primarily for government representatives and some delicate political questions were likely to be raised by representatives of communist countries he recommended that the government be represented by three officials acting as observers rather than full delegates, these officials to be drawn from the departments of National Health and Welfare, National Defence (probably from the office of the Judge Advocate General) and External Affairs. It might be left to the departments concerned to agree among themselves as to the officials who should attend and the chairmanship of the official delegation.

26. The Cabinet, after discussion, approved the recommendations of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and agreed that three officials, to be drawn from the departments of National Health and Welfare, National Defence and External Affairs, attend as observers at the 18th Session of the International Red Cross Conference beginning in Toronto on July 23rd, 1952; the departments concerned to agree among themselves in consultation with appropriate Ministers, as to the three officials who should attend and the chairmanship of the official delegation.

CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa,] July 30, 1952

Mr. Morley Scott telephoned Mr. Ritchie on July 29 to give us a preliminary report on the Red Cross Conference in Toronto and, in particular, on the handling of the issue regarding the status of the Formosan Red Cross. This subject came up for decision in the Conference on Monday, July 28.

2. The Chairman of the Conference, Mr. McAuley, put to the vote a motion sustaining the decision of the Standing Commission to maintain the status quo, i.e. the position of the Formosan Red Cross as observers. This vote was carried by 55 in favour, 25 against and 5 abstentions (both the Chinese Nationalist and Communist Delegations voting against the motion, although obviously on different grounds). The Communist Delegation voted against the motion because it was their contention that the Formosan Red Cross should not be represented at the Conference in any capacity. The Nationalist Chinese Delegation have apparently dropped the notion of a "walk out" from the Conference and seem to have accepted this decision with resignation. Mr. Scott said that they had shown great moderation in pressing their claims. In private conversations with them, he had pointed out that it was only due to the intervention of the Canadian Government that they had been invited to the Conference at all. He thought that this information had influenced their attitude in the direction of moderation.

3. Thus the first hurdle has been successfully surmounted. Mr. Scott said that the atmosphere of the Conference up to date had been tranquil and that the newspapers gave an exaggerated account of the violence of the debates. The tone taken by the Communist Delegation had, in Mr. Scott's words, been "mean rather than harsh".

4. In the way of general comment, Mr. Scott said that Mr. McAuley was making a very good Chairman and was careful to treat the Communist Delegations with courtesy and consideration. The Canadian Red Cross had shown a friendly spirit towards the Canadian Government Delegation. They were not, however, in the habit of asking for advice from our representatives, nor had Dr. Cameron and Mr. Scott yet found it necessary to proffer advice to the Canadian Red Cross.

5. We expect to hear today from Mr. Scott about the progress of the decision in the Conference on the subject of bacteriological warfare. The present intention of Dr. Cameron is to abstain from speaking on this subject unless the Canadian Government is directly attacked.

6. Mr. Scott is anxious to have your instructions as to whether he should invite Mr. Ruegger of the International Committee of the Red Cross to come to Ottawa and see you. You will recall that this was at one time suggested. M. François-Poncet will, of course, be coming but he will be here in his capacity as a senior French civil servant and is coming to address the Canadian Club. His visit, therefore, does not really appear to imply any necessity to invite Mr. Ruegger and Mr. Sandstrom of Sweden, the two other vice-presidents, who are on a basis of equality with M. François-Poncet, unless you wish to invite them.<sup>26</sup>

INTERNATIONAL RED CROSS CONFERENCE

Mr. Morley Scott telephoned me this morning to report on two matters which had arisen at the Conference:

(a) Withdrawal of the Chinese Nationalists

As you will have learned from a number of sources, the Chinese Nationalist Government delegation walked out of the Conference yesterday. The leader of their delegation, Dr. Liu, sent a letter of explanation to Mr. John MacAulay, the Chairman of the Conference. Mr. Scott could not give me the exact text of the letter but said that the first paragraph referred to the regret of the Chinese Nationalists at the Conference decision to allow the Chinese communist delegation to remain. The remaining two pages of the letter to Mr. MacAulay apparently pointed out that, as the Nationalists prophesied, the communists have ruined the Conference by making it more and more political, less and less humanitarian. Mr. Scott was told by Mr. MacAulay that he telephoned the Minister about this last evening and read him the text of the letter.

(b) Belgian resolution on violations of the Geneva Conventions

Yesterday the General Commission was offered a resolution by the Belgian delegation (it is not clear whether this is government or Red Cross) and

I don't think there is any special reason for inviting them but if they come — or express a desire to come — we could put on a lunch. L.B. P[earson] referred it to the legal sub-commission which will consider it Friday afternoon (August 1). The text of the Belgian resolution is attached.†

2. Last evening, our delegation discussed the Belgian resolution with Messrs. Wilson and Tomlinson of the United Kingdom Government delegation and with Mr. Marshall and some others of the United States Government delegation. Both the United States and United Kingdom delegates stated that they were still opposed to the Minister's suggestion that a continuing commission of enquiry be set up. Mr. Scott gave it as his personal opinion that there was almost no hope now of selling this idea to the others. However, he thought that the Belgian resolution offered an approach which might attain the same object, particularly if its wording were suitably amended. Mr. Scott suggested that the second sentence of the resolution might have inserted "considering also that these allegations have been denied": he thought that the reference to the Chinese Peoples Republic should be deleted and that a paragraph should be inserted saying,

"In view of the fact that the International Committee of the Red Cross is a proper authority for handling such complaints and also in view of the fact that a number of delegations do not think the ICRC is the proper body to deal with these complaints...."

3. In this amended form, it is likely that the Belgian resolution would gain support from other western government delegations. Apparently a meeting is to be held tomorrow afternoon to consider the amended Belgian resolution. This will be attended by the United Kingdom, United States, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and possibly by representatives of the Belgian, Dutch, Greek, Turkish and some other delegations. Mr. Scott is anxious to know whether there is any objection to holding tomorrow afternoon's meeting in the Canadian delegation's lounge as requested by the United States and United Kingdom delegations: our lounge is the only such room available since the other delegations are not provided with this amenity. However, Mr. Scott thinks that the decision to hold the meeting in the Canadian lounge should be approved by the Department. He is also anxious for guidance on how far our delegation should go in encouraging the presence at the meeting of countries in the non-Commonwealth-United States group.

4. The view of Dr. Cameron and Mr. Scott is that while the Belgian resolution is not the Minister's idea, it is a closer approach to it than they could have expected to achieve in view of the reaction to the suggestion that a continuing commission of enquiry be established. If the Minister agrees, they propose to play their share in securing the adoption of the amended Belgian resolution.

5. Mr. Scott said that he would telephone you either this afternoon or tomorrow morning, depending on when he had further information on the resolution to impart, particularly the fair text of the amended version in English.<sup>27</sup>

THE INTERNATIONAL RED CROSS

Red Cross Conference

4. Mr. Scott. The XVIIIth (quadrennial) International Red Cross Conference closed in Toronto on August 7. It will probably not be regarded as one of the important events of the year, even in Canada. The chief purposes of the Conference in ordinary times are to approve and register the recommendations of the executive bodies of the Red Cross, and to sustain and heighten the morale of the Red Cross movement. These were the purposes for which the great majority of delegates attended and to which they adhered throughout the Conference. Delegates from communist countries attended for different reasons, the chief two of which were (1) to discredit the International Committee of the Red Cross as much as they possibly could and (2) to ventilate the communist charges against the United States respecting bacteriological warfare, prisoners of war and indiscriminate bombing in Korea. The Conference re-affirmed by large majorities its confidence in the International Committee of the Red Cross. Nevertheless perhaps the most striking circumstance at the Conference was the emphasis with which the communists re-affirmed that they would have no truck nor trade with the ICRC. The communists did not "break up" the Red Cross movement nor did they read themselves out of it but what the future effectiveness of some of the Geneva Conventions may be now that the communists have completely disavowed the ICRC is doubtless a question for serious consideration. The communists certainly succeeded in ventilating their charges against the United States. They were allowed considerable freedom in doing this until the last two or three days of the Conference when the Chair, supported by a good majority, ruled charges against governments out of order. The communists were not allowed to present for the examination by the Conference the documentary evidence which they claimed to have with them. They did display this "evidence", at a press conference. The United States government delegate chose not to reply to the charges, and there was then no need for other government delegates to do so. Various proposals for enquiring into the charges were made and in these, as in other items on the agenda respecting the use of undirected weapons, ratification of the Geneva Conventions, etc., resolutions were passed framed at catching as many favourable votes as possible without having any effect upon the actual course of events. Efforts made by various delegations, including our own, to prevent the Chinese Nationalist delegation leaving the Conference (in protest against the presence of the Chinese Communists) were unsuccessful. The Chinese delegates themselves were loath to walk out and did so as undemonstratively as possible. The Canadian authorities had feared that the press or the public in Toronto might vigorously criticize the Canadian Government or the Canadian Red Cross Society or the Red Cross movement generally for permitting the communist delegations to enter Canada and to spread their propaganda. In fact, there was almost no press or public criticism of this sort. Except during the actual meetings, the Conference proceeded remarkably amicably and the communists joined cheerfully in the commendations voted both to the Government and to the Canadian Red Cross Society for the arrangements made for the amusement or comfort of its delegates.

<sup>27</sup>La résolution a été adoptée le 6 août 1952.

The resolution was passed on August 6, 1952.

INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT, NEGOTIATIONS FOR RENEWAL

16. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, referring to the discussion at the meeting of July 31st, 1951, submitted a memorandum it was proposed to present to the Special Committee of the International Wheat Council. This indicated Canadian support for renewal of the International Wheat Agreement provided price provisions in the new agreement were such that wheat prices would become and could remain equitable in relation to the general price level, that it would facilitate negotiations if member countries made known as soon as possible the quantity commitments they proposed to include in the agreement and if non-member countries were not invited to participate in negotiations until this information was available, and that a Canadian delegation would be sent to the special session of the Council in April when it was proposed that the new agreement be signed.

The memorandum was circulated.

17. The Cabinet, after discussion, approved the recommendations of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and agreed that:

(a) a memorandum, regarding negotiation of a renewal of the International Wheat Agreement, in the terms submitted by the Minister, be communicated to the Special Committee of the International Wheat Council;

Ottawa, March 29, 1952

You will recall that in February, Cabinet approved a memorandum on the Canadian attitude towards renewal of the Wheat Agreement. Plumptre met yesterday with Mitchell Sharp, who is to lead the Canadian Delegation to the Special Session of the Council which opens in London on April 15th. I think you will be interested in some of the more recent developments.

2. There have already been two meetings in Washington with the United States officials concerned and at the last McCarthy (Australia) was also present. The three exporters are all interested in seeing the Agreement renewed but, as one might expect, with a higher ceiling price. The United States is especially interested in keeping down the subsidy payments to its wheat growers and will campaign for a ceiling of $2.25 a bushel. Australia would be willing to accept a somewhat lower figure, but not less than $2.10. The Western farmers and other interests have been sounded and it seems likely that we could accept a ceiling somewhat below $2.25 (although the nominal demands of the farmers' organizations are a good deal higher). We would not wish the spread between the ceiling and the floor to exceed 50¢. The United States is prepared to renew the Agreement for a four year period, but considers that there should be an opportunity to review Agreement prices after the second year. Australia is apparently prepared to renew for two or three years at least and we are prepared to enter a four year Agreement. Apart from whatever ceiling may eventually be agreed, the Canadian Delegation will try to ensure that the range of prices is "so devised that wheat prices can remain equitable in respect of other prices."

3. The indications are that neither the U.S.S.R. nor Argentina is interested in coming into the Agreement. If this turns out to be the case, one of the major difficulties which might have been encountered by the exporters will not arise.

4. The Canadian Delegation will include, amongst the advisers drawn from the Western grain interests, a nominee of the Communist led<sup>28</sup> Farmers' Union. It was apparently considered better to have a Farmers' representative in the Delegation than to have the Union sniping from outside. The representative in question has been cleared by the R.C.M.P. A press release giving the full list of delegates and advisers from Canada may be released today.

5. The intentions of the large importers on renewal are not known, but it is understood that the United Kingdom position on many of the main points likely to arise in the negotiations has not been considered either by Ministers or senior civil servants. This being the case, Sharp expects that the April meeting will not be conclusive, but will adjourn after the main issues have been identified and differences between exporters and importers narrowed. Considerable progress might, however, be made on many of the subsidiary questions such as "carrying charges" which will have to be regulated in the new Agreement.

6. In the knowledge that the Western farmers are behind the Agreement, that the U.S.S.R. and Argentina are apparently not interested in becoming members and that the United States Delegation will make the running on the higher ceiling price, the position of the Canadian Delegation in the forthcoming negotiations should be a good deal easier than it might otherwise have been. From what Sharp said, it would appear that we are informally committed to support the United States on the $2.25 ceiling, at least during the opening stages of the negotiations. We have, I understand, undertaken not to withdraw this support without prior consultation with the United States Delegation.

7. The price proposals of the United States are regarded as particularly confidential at this stage.

INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT — PRELIMINARY TALKS

Following for Mr. C.D. Howe from Sharp. Suggest repeat to McIvor,<sup>29</sup> Begins: Les Wheeler called the Australians and ourselves to an informal meeting yesterday afternoon to exchange views on the main aspects of the new agreement and the tactics to be followed by the group as exporters.

2. He led off by saying that the United States position on the three main points involved, namely prices, quantities, and duration, had been discussed with the Secretary of Agriculture and members of Congress. (Incidentally, Congressman Horan is a member of the United States delegation; we understand that others will replace him later.)

3. Wheeler said that the form of the agreement remained acceptable and that they were satisfied with its method of operation. There was need, however, for greater flexibility and a substantial increase in prices.

4. His instructions, which he will announce in his opening statement in the Council probably today, are to obtain a fixed floor of $1.90 and a ceiling of $2.50 — both exclusive of carrying charges. He had no specific reason for the

G.H. McIvor, Chief Commissioner, Canadian Wheat Board.

$1.90 figure, but explained that the ceiling of $2.50 was directly related to the present United States parity system: he explained that a two-thirds majority in the Senate would not be obtained if a drain on the United States treasury of half-a-billion or so dollars were again to result from a new agreement.

5. With respect to quantities, the United States are willing to maintain their present quota of 255. As to duration, a four-year agreement seemed to be a reasonable compromise. To obtain greater flexibility, however, they will explore agreement on a price-adjustment formula.

6. McCarthy for Australia said that they also were satisfied with the form of the agreement as it now stands and think that a duration of four years is desirable. As to quantity, the matter was under discussion in Canberra — there was some feeling that their quota of 88 might be too high. As for prices, their position was not yet clear, but they hold strongly to the view that the agreement has worked to their disadvantage.

7. We limited ourselves at this stage to agreeing in principle with the United States general position. We did not commit ourselves at this time to support the United States proposed prices. We said that we would want to be careful about agreeing to maintain our present quota of 235 before knowing what prices might finally be agreed. As to duration, this too would depend upon price level and any possible means of achieving flexibility. At a satisfactory price, we were thinking in terms of four years.

8. As a result of some discussion on tactics, it was agreed that, in view of the present position of the three delegations, the Australians and ourselves would speak first, indicating necessity for substantial increase in prices, but leaving it to the United States to mention their specific figures. By such tactics, we avoid identifying ourselves with United States levels. This approach has the unanimous concurrence of our delegation pending further clarification of position. Ends.

CONFIDENTIAL

Following for Rt. Hon. C.D. Howe from Sharp, suggest repeat to McIvor, Begins: First meeting of exporters was held yesterday afternoon, attended by United States, Australia, France and Canada, to discuss outstanding issues which had been raised in full conference and in committees.

2. Discussion centred around question of prices and ancillary conditions. All delegations have instructions or views of farm organizations that flexibility should be introduced into new agreement. Objections were raised, however, to all proposals mentioned. Serious doubt was expressed whether priced index of commodities could be devised for adjusting maximum and minimum wheat prices from time to time, which would be acceptable to all countries. Similarly, serious difficulties were encountered in applying Wilson's formula for basing maximum and minimum prices upon the level of actual prices during the preceding year. In view of desire of all exporters to explore flexibility devices thoroughly, it was agreed to leave the matter open for further discussion.

3. McNamara reported that he was hopeful that proposals for changing basing point from Fort William to f.o.b. seaboard and for introducing fixed grade differentials would not be found feasible and would be dropped.

4. Exporters agreed that discussions of price levels should be ex-carrying charges. However, carrying charges may have to be defined more clearly and perhaps be subject to limits.

5. Wheeler, for United States, then opened discussion of price levels and asked Canada and Australia to state their positions. We said that we could not return home and say we had refused to sign an agreement because we could not obtain a minimum of $1.90 and a maximum of $2.50. We therefore could not give them support at these prices. Australia took a similar line. After prolonged discussion the United States asked Canada and Australia to name a price at which they could take a stand.

6. At subsequent meeting of Canadian delegation, attended by all farm advisers, it was agreed that I should attempt to determine from Wheeler whether the United States delegation was prepared to bargain or whether they are merely stating their position for domestic political reasons and would be content to break off negotiations. If United States delegation is not prepared to bargain, we are doubtful we should state a price — because, if the conference broke up without agreement, this price which might have been stated by us for bargaining purposes would subsequently be embarrassing. On the other hand, if the United States is prepared to bargain and to attempt to reach agreement with the importers, we can afford, as a bargaining matter, to state a price at this time a good deal higher than we would be prepared to take, in order to maintain a common front with the United States, who must be prepared to sign — otherwise there will be no world wheat agreement.

7. All importers are reported to be taking the position that they will make no response to prices as high as those indicated by the United States and we are inclined to believe that this is so. Progress will be made only if the importers can be split by a price offer from the exporters that will persuade some of them at least to make counter-proposals.

1. Canada would favour a common front amongst exporting countries on the basis of minimum of $1.75 and maximum of $2.25 both ex carrying charges, and would be prepared to take a firm bargaining position at these levels during negotiations. Wheeler to be free to transmit these views to Washington. Canada will not take independent action until American reaction has been received and considered.

2. I transmitted these views to Wheeler today and he said that they did not come as a surprise. He was not optimistic, however, that the United States Administration would go along on a common front at these levels.

CONFIDENTIAL. MOST IMMEDIATE.

Following for Rt. Hon. C.D. Howe, from Sharp. Suggest repeat to McIvor, Begins: United States delegation has now received instructions as follows:

1. Maintain present price proposal of $1.90-$2.50 until there is a reasonable counter-proposal from importers.

2. Try to persuade other exporters to support United States position.

3. Continue to try to interest importers in flexible price formula.

4. Explain that if United States has to accept lower prices then quota must be reduced.

During course of explanation Wheeler expressed his personal opinion that, in view of impending elections, Congressional advisers are anxious to avoid withdrawing from present position unless they can demonstrate that importers are really willing to pay higher prices. Wheeler intends to make statement Friday three p.m., London time.

Canadian delegation has considered position and with unanimous agreement I intend to take following lines:

Canada has already indicated that it believes a substantial increase in prices is justified but has come to the conference prepared to negotiate. However, until importers indicate that they recognize facts of present situation and are willing to begin bargaining at prices higher than in the present agreement, and thus enable United States to participate in such bargaining, there is no point in Canada putting forward specific price proposals at the present time.

The Canadian delegation has doubts about possibility of reaching price agreement at present session because of position taken by United States and, as previously reported, by Harwood of the United Kingdom. We believe it would be a mistake to put forward any specific prices at this stage, which would become basis for bargaining at later session in the (group corrupt). On the other hand, it is important to indicate clearly that we are not holding out for the United States price range.

At meeting with Wheeler, McCarthy of Australia expressed views similar to ours, but what he will say at open meeting we do not yet know.

Unless we hear to the contrary, I shall speak along these lines. It may be necessary to speak immediately following Wheeler. Would, therefore, appreciate any comments by Friday morning London time. Ends.

CONFIDENTIAL. IMMEDIATE.

Following for Rt. Hon. C.D. Howe from Sharp. Suggest repeat to McIvor, Begins: Further our telegram No. 1122 of 3 May. Following is statement made by Van Essche (Belgium) this morning on behalf of the importer countries. Meeting then adjourned till tomorrow morning when exporters will reply probably in a joint statement to be prepared later today.

"I have been entrusted with the honour of making the following statement which represents the unanimous views of the importer members.

'1. On Friday last, 2 May, statements were made by the leaders of the delegations of the three principal exporter members of the council of which the following is a summary:

(a) The United States delegate stated that he was instructed by his government

(i) To maintain the original United States proposal until a reasonable counter offer was made;

(ii) To continue to attempt to enlist support for the principle of a flexible formula;

(iii) To state that any lower price than that originally proposed by the United States would necessarily cause the United States to re-examine its position as to the quantity of wheat it could guarantee to supply under an extended wheat agreement:

(b) The Canadian delegate repeated his government's desire for substantially higher prices but refrained from subscribing without reserve to the United States price proposals. He enjoined the importers to consider making an approach on the minimum of a new price range.

(c) The Australian delegate did not support the United States price proposals but repeated his government's desire for higher prices. He reproved the importers for what he alleged as a too casual dismissal of the conception of flexible prices and for having shown little eagerness to advance to realistic price discussions.

"2. In the opinion of the importer members of the council these statements, which are no more than a reiteration of those made on the opening day of this session, show insufficient regard for the views and proposals of the importers on the many important matters which have been raised in the course of this session.

"3. The importer members of the council present at this 8th session have considered the situation thus created and make the following unanimous declaration of their position.

(a) They are ready, as they have already indicated, to co-operate fully with the exporters in the study of method (group corrupt) prices would be adjusted by an automatic process to give flexibility. Such a system has certain potential advantages. But to command universal support such a system must be intelligible, workable, and defensible and the importers have so far been unable to suggest a practical formula which would satisfy these essential requirements, notwithstanding the valuable contribution made by F.A.O. This is true also of the exporters to whom the problem was delegated in the first instance because they have so far failed to submit any proposals for consideration.

It must be apparent however to the exporters that, pending an agreed conclusion on the adoption or rejection of this matter — which the importers agree with the exporters is worthy of serious study — there can be no detailed discussion on prices. The adoption of a flexible price mechanism would inevitably affect the whole character of the discussion the price range in any renewed agreement.

(b) The importers maintain their conviction that there can be no serious consideration of the price range itself until agreement has been reached on the terms and conditions in any new agreement affecting that price range. Discussion on prices would be unrealistic until it was known, for example, whether the prices were to be expressed upon f.o.b. or in store basis and what they were to include by way of charges and costs.

(c) On the question of price the importers view with some surprise, if not concern, the attitude which regards only proposals made by the exporters as serious and affects to look upon the counter proposals of the importers as unworthy of serious consideration. The importers affirm that their counter bid at the maximum is the equivalent of $1.80 in store Fort William/Port Arthur inclusive of carrying charges and other costs, with a spread similar to that at present existing.

The importers consider that this offer is favourable to the exporters bearing in mind the long term commitment necessarily involved and the valuable insurance to the producer inherent in an agreement of this nature. On the other hand, prices of this order impose a considerable strain upon the internal economies and balance of payments position of many importing countries.

(d) The importers note that in certain circumstances, not precisely defined, the exporters might feel bound to reduce the quantities which they would be prepared to guarantee under a renewed agreement. This possibility affords an additional ground for inviting the participation in a renewed agreement of additional exporting countries. The importers intend therefore to invite the chairman to make time available, at the earliest opportunity, for the council to consider the most appropriate means of giving effect to this suggestion.

"4. With the object of advancing the business of this session the importers propose as the next steps:

(a) That the Prices and Quantities Committee be instructed to resume at once their study of the question of a flexible price system and to make recommendations to the council;

(b) That a determined effort be made by the council to reach agreement on the terms and conditions affecting price;

(c) That, independently of these matters, the chairman should make time available at the earliest opportunity for the council to consider the most appropriate means by which new exporters (and those importing countries which have already expressed an interest) may be associated with the discussion on the terms of a renewed agreement.' " Ends.

Following for Right Honourable C.D. Howe from Sharp, Begins: Suggest repeat to McIvor.

Following is statement I made this morning. Australia associated itself with our prices proposal. Shall report reactions as soon as they become clearer.

"My fellow delegates from the United States, Australia, and France have accorded me the honour of speaking first among the exporting countries in reply to the importers' statement submitted by Mr. Van Essche yesterday. Let me make it clear at the outset however, that I am not submitting a joint statement on their behalf. I am speaking for Canada, although I believe that most, if not all, of what I have to say substantially represents the views of all of us.

The Canadian delegation has received with the keenest regret the statement submitted yesterday by Mr. Van Essche, on behalf of the importers. We had hoped that it would have indicated the direction in which real progress could be made and we have studied it carefully with that in view. However, I have to say that our efforts have not been rewarded.

When the exporters spoke on Friday last they invited the importing countries to come forward with their ideas on prices. I shall not reiterate my own words, but I should like to recall what Mr. McCarthy said: 'Australia takes the view that importers should indicate what they have in their minds, whether they can contemplate the increase in prices and approximately, at least, what they propose.'

What was the response to that invitation? Let me refer you to paragraph (b) and (c) of section 3 of the importers' statement (our telegram No. 1137)

(b) The importers ..... costs

(c) On the question..... countries.

The Canadian delegation has given these paragraphs the most careful study, for we take it that they represent the considered views of the importers as a group. You may be surprised to learn that we took some comfort from what I have just read. It had been contended, from time to time, by several of the importers, that before discussing price levels it was necessary to clear up ancillary matters, such as basing points, carrying charges and so forth. This idea, you will note, is emphasized again in paragraph (b), which I have just read.

But in the following paragraph the importers do show that it is possible, as we have always contended, to discuss prices by making certain assumptions about these ancillary matters. I hope that no one will think that in saying this I am merely trying to score a debating point. This is a matter of great concern to the Canadian delegation and I believe that what is said in this importers' statement does enable us to move forward to a discussion of the level of prices without settling beforehand all the matters of detail that are inevitably bound up in the final definition of agreed prices.

The second point which emerges from a study of these paragraphs is that what the importers are proposing is that the level of maximum prices should be lower in a new agreement than in the present agreement. This is so because the $1.80 is defined to include carrying charges, whereas under the present agreement importers are buying on a basis of $1.80 plus carrying charges.

As to the minimum, the wording seems to us to be ambiguous and the only interpretation I can put on the statement is that there is to be no change from the present agreement. This cursory treatment of the minimum is a matter of particular regret to the Canadian delegation in view of the importance which we attach to this matter and which I am pleased to see is noted at the opening of the statement itself.

What then was the response of the importers to the invitation to come forward with a proposal? In brief, first, a statement that prices could not be seriously discussed until ancillary matters had been cleared out of the way, and then an offer of prices lower than in the present agreement.

I say quite bluntly that if this is the attitude of the importing countries we might as well go home and the sooner the better. I find it difficult to believe, however, that this is the final word or that all importing countries are content that this is an adequate expression of their views. Certainly, it is difficult for us to reconcile this attitude with the desire of many importing countries for larger quotas.

How, then, do we come to grips with the questions of prices and quantities? As I have said, the reaction of the importers to the invitation of the exporters to show a willingness to negotiate on a reasonable price level has been most disappointing. I am tempted to conclude that some of them are not prepared to negotiate at all and we have to remember that at the opening session the delegate of the United Kingdom expressed doubts as to whether a wheat agreement is a good thing, even before prices had been mentioned.

It may be, however, that the fact that Canada has not put forward a price proposal stands in the way of progress. When I spoke last Friday I doubted whether, under the circumstances then prevailing, it would be useful for Canada to name a price range, since the United States had to be satisfied if there was to be an agreement at all.

We have now reconsidered. We do not wish there to be any misunderstanding of our position. Neither do we wish to be open to the charge that the importers were not prepared to discuss prices on a realistic basis because Canada had refused to make a definite proposal.

We, therefore, propose a price range of $1.75 minimum and $2.25 maximum, basis in store Fort William/Port Arthur, both exclusive of carrying charges, for a period of four years. If anyone can suggest a feasible method of introducing some flexibility into that range during the currency of the new agreement we would be prepared to consider (it?). But it is a firm proposal and not contingent on any such flexibility arrangement.

Similarly, if it were agreed to shift the basing point — with which we are not in agreement — it would be necessary to make consequential adjustments in prices. Again let me reiterate that, in our view, this proposal can be discussed on its merits and that it is not necessary to settle such ancillary matters in advance.

I can only hope that this statement of our position will help to convince our friends in the importing countries, if any of them had doubts that we are ready to negotiate now, and that it may also elicit the kind of response from the importers which will enable the United States to come down to a similar level." Ends.

VIII International Wheat Agreement; collapse of discussions

33. The Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce said word had been received that the discussions for the extension of the Wheat Agreement had collapsed. The United States had held out for an increase in the price to $2.50. The Canadian representatives had finally indicated a price of $2.25 in order to make it clear that they were prepared to negotiate. The importing countries were not prepared to go above $1.80. It had become clear that there was no possibility of reaching an agreement. The importers had suggested that it might be possible to discuss certain other matters, such as basing points, but the exporting countries had taken the position that there was no basis for agreement on other matters unless the price question could be settled. The present agreement would run until the end of July 1953. There was some possibility that another meeting might be attempted in Washington after the U.S. election.

COMMITTEE OF FIVE<sup>1</sup>

It is now possible to foresee the general outlines of the report which the Working Group can have ready for ministerial consideration in time for the Lisbon Conference.

2. The report will contain a brief introduction emphasizing that in the short interval which has elapsed since the Rome session it has only been practicable for the committee to register practical progress in two limited fields. The introduction will also stress the fact that the problems to which the committee is addressing itself are essentially long-term in character and that spectacular achievements are not to be expected. At the same time, attention will be drawn to three positive steps which have been taken since the Rome meeting, which represent substantial progress in strengthening the institutions of the organization as a whole and establishing closer relationships between the members of NATO: (1) the proposals for the reorganization of the civilian

This was a ministerial committee composed of representatives of Belgium, Canada, Italy, the Netherlands and Norway established by the North Atlantic Council at its meeting in Ottawa, September 15-20, 1951, "to consider the further strengthening of the North Atlantic Community and especially the implementation of Article II of the North Atlantic Treaty."

agencies of NATO; (2) the TCC exercise;<sup>2</sup> and (3) the progress made in the establishment of the EDC within the broader NATO framework. It will conclude by indicating the limited and specific areas where proposals for action can now be made, and will point out that NATO action in the whole non-military field must take into account the existence of other organizations, avoid duplication of their work and seek to deal with problems as they emerge which are not being dealt with by other agencies and which appear to be susceptible of solution on a NATO basis.

3. The specific sections of the Graft report may be briefly summarized as follows:

Political consultation

4. The report will stress the importance which the committee attaches to the provisions of Section A of the interim report and will say that this section does not require elaboration but rather practical application. The attention of the Council will be drawn to the continuing need for effective consultation at an early stage on current political questions of common concern.

“This is essential in order that national policies may be developed and action taken on the basis of an awareness of the attitudes and interests of all the members of NATO.

“The proposals for the reorganization and concentration of the civilian agencies of NATO which the Council will be considering at Lisbon should result in the development of more rapid and effective procedures for arriving at joint decisions in the whole field of NATO effort and activity. In the field of political consultation it is the hope of the committee that these procedures will be utilized by member governments to the fullest extent for frequent exchanges of information and views on urgent and important issues. Such procedures will be effective to the extent to which North Atlantic Treaty Governments are prepared to grant their representatives the necessary measure of authority and discretion to participate fully in such discussion.”

Possible relations between Parliamentary representatives and NATO

5. The Working Group has no further proposals to make in this field prior to the Lisbon meeting. Your attention is drawn to the fact, however, that in the United States proposals (Document DD(52)17) there is the following reference in Part IV.

“Some means may eventually have to be found for greater association of parliamentarians with NATO, in view of its dependence upon legislatures for funds. This problem will probably have to be handled nationally, possibly by including members of legislatures in delegations to general meetings of the Council.”

This section has not yet been discussed in the Deputies in connection with reorganization.

Economic and financial matters

6. We have received from Paris text of the draft FEB report as prepared by the FEB Working Group, but have not yet received a final text. The draft is essentially negative in character, its principal positive feature being the statement that it is the view of the board that when dealing with these problems outside NATO member governments should bear in mind that any specific solution evolved will have an important influence both on defence effort and on the longer-term development of the Atlantic Community. We understand that the final report is only slightly more positive than the draft text. In any event, the FEB comments will constitute the principal section of the Working Group's report on economic and financial matters.

Movement of labour

7. My telegram No. 269 of January 25th+ and our previous exchanges will have summarized the progress made in this field, which, in the view of the Working Group provides one of the few areas in which a specific line of action at the Lisbon meeting can be foreseen.

Cooperation in the social field

8. In the light of a report which the Norwegian representative had obtained of the work in the social field now being undertaken under the aegis of the Council of Europe, and further discussion in the group itself, general agreement has now been reached that grounds do not exist at this time for the convening of an expert conference, as proposed in paragraph 31 of the interim report. The primary reason for this is that social cooperation lends itself particularly to regional collaboration and that the position and problems in North America and Europe are so different that constructive work in this field on a NATO basis does not appear to be practicable at this time.

Collaboration in the fields of (a) culture, (b) public information

9. (a) In the cultural field, on the basis of a carefully prepared report from a sub-committee which met under the chairmanship of Van der Bruggen, of Belgium, the Working Group considers that progress can be made by convening a meeting of cultural experts. Progress might be made on four projects: (1) possible educational exchanges between university students of NAT countries; (2) encouragement of travel by groups of young people; (3) establishment of service leave centres in NAT countries for educational purposes; and (4) seminars of teachers from NAT countries. Our telegram No. 157 of January 18th refers.

(b) In the public information field, considerable difficulty has arisen in making progress. It will be recalled that prior to the Rome meeting the Working Group had been informed by the NATO Information Service that NATIS was planning to prepare a comprehensive programme for submission to governments. The interim report approved by the Council contented itself with expressing the view that before any programme, long-term or immediate, went forward to NAT Governments for consideration, it should be carefully examined in the Council Deputies. "NATIS" has now produced a Document (AC/10-D/7 of January 22nd), outlining possible projects for an "Atlantic Community programme" but unfortunately linking its presentation with a great deal of special pleading for staff and budget, which was clearly premature and out of place. The document, as drafted, placed undue emphasis on the over-all role of "NATIS" in this field, and did not really meet the committee's requirements for a list of concrete projects which might then be submitted to national governments for comments, and for an indication of the extent to which action on such projects might be considered advisable and whether any action should be taken at this stage to recommend a meeting of experts in this field, but the general feeling was that the projects as drafted by NATIS required a good deal of further study and preparation before such a meeting would be useful. It was also felt that NATIS should clarify its objectives and prepare a more limited programme directed towards: (1) the fuller flow of information on the NATO alliance and national efforts; (2) the creation of a sense of "Atlantic Community"; and (3) the strengthening of mutual understanding between NAT countries and the stimulation of an increased consciousness of their common ties and cultural associations.

10. The "NATIS" draft paper also contained the recommendation that "the Article 2 Committee should be permanently established as an advisory committee to the Information Services for Atlantic Community matters." It was the view of the committee that it would be premature, in view of the general reorganization now in progress, to make any specific recommendations as to the responsibilities of the Committee of Five in this field.

11. The Working Group at its next meeting, will be considering further what sections should be included in the report as a whole. It is probable that the report in the information field will indicate that the Information Service should prepare for consideration of the Council concrete proposals to provide a basis for meeting the objective outlined in paragraph 9(b) above.

12. The foregoing summary will make it clear that the Working Group report will include proposals for specific action in only two fields — movement of labour and in certain limited, but it is hoped practical, aspects of cultural relations.

13. The Working Group is fully conscious of the fact that a good deal of interest and attention has been devoted to the work of the Committee of Five, and that such meagre progress as we have been able to make may create a sense of disillusionment. One thing our experience has shown is that in most of these fields with which we have been dealing it is impossible to make real progress without placing the consideration of the problems on a twelve-power basis. The Netherlands Deputy appears to be inclined to the view that the Committee of Five has done virtually all it can in this general field, and that it might be wound up after the Lisbon meeting. Clearly the future of the committee is a matter for ministers. My own view is that if the committee continues after Lisbon it should not be placed in the position of having to make a detailed report to the Council at regular intervals, but should only examine problems which may emerge from time to time bearing on the general goal of strengthening the North Atlantic Community and report when it has had time to consider them.

14. I recognize that just as we have found ourselves here dealing with problems of more immediate priority, i.e., TCC exercise, EDC-NATO relationships and the rest, the Department has been similarly placed. This perhaps explains the fact that since the Rome meeting we have in fact received very little in the way of guidance and direction as to departmental thinking in this field.

15. Your comments on the direction which the work is taking, and on the lines of the report as I have sketched them, would be greatly appreciated.

NORTH ATLANTIC COMMUNITY COMMITTEE

Addressed to Ottawa as No. 448 repeated to Paris as No. 42.

Following from the Minister, Begins: Lange, Stikker, Van Zeeland, Rossi Longhi<sup>3</sup> representing Pella,<sup>4</sup> and Achilles<sup>5</sup> came to an informal meeting on Saturday morning when we had a very useful and very frank discussion about the draft report of the Working Group on the North Atlantic Community (document (AC/10-D)6 2nd revise) and also about the future of the North Atlantic Community Committee itself. There was general agreement that the report was a negative and rather discouraging document. Stikker for one said that he could not accept it if it were presented at Lisbon in its present form. More particularly he was afraid that the contents would inevitably leak out to the press and that the whole exercise might become the subject of unfavourable and disparaging public comment.

Alberto Rossi Longhi, Permanent Representative of Italy on North Atlantic Council.

<sup>4</sup>Giuseppe Pella, ministre du Budget de l'Italie (-février).

Giuseppe Pella, Minister of the Budget of Italy (-February).

Theodore C. Achilles, Vice Deputy Representative of the United States on North Atlantic Council.

2. The criticism concentrated not so much on what was in the report as on what had been left out. It was emphasized most strongly that the report took little account of a number of immediate economic problems which had to be solved if the North Atlantic Community was to become an attainable objective. Among others these problems included European payments, the liberalization of trade, production and productivity and internal financial stability, all of which had so far come primarily within the mandate of OEEC. As a matter of urgency they should now be given careful consideration on a NATO basis as well, but the ramifications were so great that real progress could be made on the NATO side only by the collective effort of all countries at this stage. It was not sufficient to delegate the responsibilities to a committee of five members.

3. It was recognized that some NATO members also had substantial trading interests with countries such as Sweden and Switzerland who were members of OEEC but not NATO. The logical compromise was for NATO and OEEC to come to some arrangement for cooperation — without duplication — in economic matters. This might create difficulties in the case of Switzerland and to a lesser extent Sweden who, jealous of their “neutral” position, might object to associating themselves formally with NATO planning even in its non-military aspects. To help overcome the dilemma with which these two countries might be faced, it was considered that the initiative in proposing joint action must come from OEEC and be quickly seized by NATO. It is indicative of the importance which Belgium attaches to early action by NATO that Van Zeeland at one point went so far as to suggest that it might even be worth taking the risk of confronting “neutral” countries in OEEC with the necessity of agreeing to such cooperation or withdrawing.

4. A further problem was Germany, whose whole-hearted participation was essential to any programme aimed at improving economic conditions in Western Europe. Since membership in OEEC alone would obviously be inadequate, it was felt that consultations between EDC and NATO might provide an appropriate forum for bringing Germany more fully into the picture at the present time. Van Zeeland observed that this problem would be solved “eventually when Germany becomes a member of NATO,” but he doubted if the Germans would be satisfied now with any arrangement which did not give them equal status with their Western European partners.

5. To accord due priority to the critical economic problems, it was agreed that the report of the Working Group should be revised so as to include an introduction setting forth in general terms the ideas which were expressed at the meeting. These will include a recommendation that the responsibilities of the North Atlantic Community Committee should be transferred to the Council. The section dealing with the movement of labour, to which the Working Group has devoted special attention, will not be changed, and the social and cultural aspects will be played down in relation to the other aspects of non-military cooperation.

6. At the suggestion of the meeting, I am drafting the proposed changes for the report which should be ready in its amended form for a further informal meeting of the committee on Thursday.

7. Copies of this telegram are being sent by bag to Oslo, The Hague, Brussels, Bonn and Rome. Ends.

TELEGRAM 393

Ottawa, February 13, 1952

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

NORTH ATLANTIC COMMUNITY COMMITTEE

Addressed to London No. 393 repeated to Paris No. 295 (no priority).

Reference: Your telegram No. 448 of February 11.

Following for the Minister.

The following suggestions regarding your telegram emerged in a brief informal discussion with officials of the other interested Departments.

2. There seem to be two dangers that should be weighed against each other. On the one hand there is the danger, emphasized by Dr. Stikker, that the Report of the Community Committee will be very slim and will become the subject of unfavourable comment. You are fully aware of this danger and no further emphasis from here is required.

3. On the other hand there is a second danger, which Dr. Stikker may have been underestimating. . . . In the final analysis the necessary corrective measures in such fields as European payments, trade liberalization, productivity and financial stability must be taken by national governments as matters of internal policy. As the Commonwealth Finance Ministers said in their communique when dealing with the economic problems of sterling area countries: "The methods . . . are within the discretion of each country concerned and will vary according to their individual circumstances. The first, and most important, step is to ensure that the internal economy is sound. . . ." Fundamentally, lack of progress in the fields mentioned by Dr. Stikker would seem to be attributable to the attitudes of individual governments and the political and economic forces surrounding them rather than to the lack of international organizations, or to the fact that existing organizations do not in every case have exactly the right membership and terms of reference to deal with particular problems. Transference of a problem from one organization to another can sometimes be helpful, but only when the stars are favourable; and it is difficult to believe that they are favourable just at present for transfers from OEEC to NATO. OEEC has probably taken the matters referred to just about as far as practicable under the present political and economic circumstances in Europe and in the light of the amount of economic and military aid likely to be forthcoming from the United States. If NATO picks them up now it will add internal stresses and strains to an organization that is already under considerable strain in other directions. The danger is that NATO will be saddled with all these problems and that the countries concerned will use this as an excuse to postpone changes of policy on which the solution of the problems in large measure depends. In the long run this could be pretty damaging to the North Atlantic Community.

4. In general, joint action between NATO and OEEC is to be welcomed. This is an important consideration pointing towards establishment of NATO civilian headquarters in Paris. Up to the present there have been very useful instances of such joint action; the T.C.C. exercise is the outstanding example. A precondition of this joint action so far has been that it has not been spectacular and not been publicized, and hence acceptable (under protest) to Sweden and Switzerland. When Plumptre talked to Marjolin<sup>6</sup> and Leroy Beaulieu<sup>7</sup> in Paris, after the Committee meeting there early last November, they both emphasized the importance of informality. The introduction of formality would probably mean the loss of Switzerland and Sweden and this would not seem worthwhile unless it is clear beyond doubt that really substantial progress and achievements would result.

5. The desirability that NATO should from time to time pick up particular economic subjects at appropriate moments and give them a "push" was envisaged in Section B,I,3, of the original Working Group report to the Committee of Five last November. This section was under consideration by FEB at the time of the Rome meeting and was therefore not covered by the Committee's interim report at that time; it is referred to only in the second sentence of paragraph 23 of the interim report. It is doubtful, to judge from the subsequent papers and telegrams, whether FEB fully grasped the point of these suggestions.

6. It is suggested that, in following up and redrafting Dr. Stikker's suggestions, you might wish to go back to the agreed Working Group report. Thus the emphasis might be, not on a wholesale transfer of OEEC problems to NATO, and a formalization of relations between them, but active exploration of matters where NATO initiative might be productive.

7. In the future NATO will almost certainly be carrying out something like the T.C.C. exercise on a continuing basis and the economic position and problems of member countries will naturally come under review. Moreover, the allocation of the United States military and economic assistance is likely to depend in large measure on the assessment made in NATO of military requirements on the one hand and politico-economic capacities on the other. This is the sort of operation in which NATO would seem to have a primary interest and which the organization would be expected to perform. If this is what Dr. Stikker has in mind, we would not be worried.

NORTH ATLANTIC COMMUNITY COMMITTEE

Following for Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, from Heeney, Begins: This committee met on February 18 and agreed on a report to be submitted to Council (probably on Saturday). The report follows the lines of the documents circulated in Ottawa before the departure of the Canadian delegation to NATO with the following exceptions:

Movement of labour

In line with the recommendations of the inter-departmental committee in Ottawa, the North Atlantic Community Committee has agreed to drop the proposal for a meeting of experts in the manpower field. The permanent North Atlantic Treaty Organization is now to be requested to "make recommendations for eliminating manpower shortages" and their consideration of this subject is to include the various elements that, under a previous resolution, would have been taken into consideration by the meeting of experts.

Economic and general matters

The proposals which Mr. Stikker originally put forward and which were summarized in telegram No. 448 from London to Ottawa of February 11th have since that time gone through several revisions in the light of the reply (No. 393 from Ottawa to London of February 15) and comments put forward from the United Kingdom and other sources. The suggestion of closer arrangements with OEEC remains in the report but it is phrased tentatively and the paragraphs concerned with this matter lead to the conclusions,

(a) That the subject must be considered by the whole Council and not by a committee representing the five countries only, and

(b) That "if and when the Council is established in continuous session, the functions of the committee shall be transferred to the new Council." We do not consider that the paragraphs as they now stand will imply any new obligations or lead to unreasonable hopes regarding NATO activities in the commercial field.

N.A.T.O.; reorganization; relationship to Germany

30. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to discussion at the meeting of December 4th, 1951, said certain proposals for changes in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization would be placed before the N.A.T.O. Council at its forthcoming meeting in Lisbon. The main changes contemplated were abolition of the Council Deputies and creation of a Council in continuous session, with Ministers attending only when required; appointment of a Director-General or Secretary-General who would also be vice-chairman of the permanent Council and might be of ministerial experience; and selection of London or Paris as the permanent headquarters for most N.A.T.O. organs.

Creation of a permanent Council would necessitate appointment of a full-time Canadian representative and delegation.<sup>9</sup> The U.S. Government considered the Secretary-General should not be an American. The preliminary Canadian position taken on the question of concentrating N.A.T.O. agencies in one capital was that, on balance, Paris would be the best site.

31. The Minister of National Defence felt the change in the organization of the Council should be duplicated on the military side, with the Military Committee in permanent session but normally attended by representatives of its members.

32. Mr. Pearson thought it difficult to foresee what would happen if there were a failure to agree on the future position of Western Germany. The United States would like it to become a member of N.A.T.O. and, while French opinion in the matter had evolved considerably during the past year, the French government was opposed to such a step being taken until the problem of Germany's boundaries was settled and the French public was further prepared. If Germany was to collaborate in Western defence, it would probably want to participate in policy forming and might want an undertaking that its eastern boundaries, even those of the pre-1945 period, would be defended.

33. The Prime Minister said that, although it would not be possible to agree to defend the old German borders, the remainder of the price Germany was now setting for its collaboration in defence was no higher than that anticipated for some time and no more than would have to be paid.

34. The Cabinet, after further discussion:

(a) noted with approval the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding proposals for changes in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization that would be placed before the N.A.T.O. Council at its forthcoming meetings in Lisbon; and,

(b) noted the Minister's report as to problems being encountered in negotiations regarding the relationship of Germany to Western defence arrangements.

Ottawa, February 19, 1952

THE LISBON MEETING OF NATO

1. The three major topics on the agenda for the Lisbon meeting of the NATO Council are: the TCC Report; reorganization of the civil side of NATO; and the association of the German Republic in Western defence.

The TCC Report

2. The original comments of Belgium to the recommendations of the Executive Bureau of the Temporary Council Committee<sup>10</sup> have been amended (as have those of Canada), and it is understood that the Report of the Executive Bureau to the Council has been amended to take account of these changes. It is now felt that the very large measure of agreement on the recommendations of the Bureau will make possible an effective programme of action on the military as well as on the civil side of NATO for the coming year.

3. It is also thought that the U.S. administration will be able to report to Congress that there is a sufficiently large measure of agreement on the Report to warrant approval by Congress of the appropriations for mutual aid (military and economic) for European members for 1952-1953. (It is not improbable that a good deal of the non-military side of the Report will become public in Congressional hearings.)

Reorganization of NATO

4. There is general agreement among member Governments that non-military organs of NATO should be concentrated in one capital; that the present more or less autonomous boards should be abolished and all brought under the Council; that the Council should be in continuous session, governments being left to decide whether at any particular meeting they should be represented by

---

<sup>10</sup>Le Conseil de l'Atlantique Nord a créé un Comité temporaire du Conseil au cours de sa réunion de septembre 1951 à Ottawa pour faire des recommandations concernant les contributions que les pays membres pourraient apporter à la défense, eu égard à leurs possibilités politiques et économiques.

The Temporary Council Committee was established by the North Atlantic Council at its September 1951 meeting in Ottawa to make recommendations concerning the defence contributions of member states in relation to their political and economic positions.

Ministers or officials; that Governments should be represented by separate missions to the NATO Council; that an outstanding person be appointed to a new office, that of Secretary-General.

5. On two matters there are still differences of opinion:

(1) Whether non-military organs of NATO could be located in Paris or London, — the U.K. Government feels strongly it should be London and in this they have some support from the Italian and Icelandic Governments other governments favour Paris;

(2) Whether the Secretary-General should be the Vice-Chairman of Council with the duty of presiding in the absence of the Chairman. (There is general agreement that the chairmanship of the Council should rotate alphabetically as now.)

There is also the problem of finding a suitable, and willing, candidate for the post.

Association of Germany in Western Defence

6. It was hoped that by the time of the Lisbon meeting the European governments negotiating on the establishment of a European Defence Community (France, Italy, Belgium, the Netherlands, Luxembourg and the German Republic) would have reached agreement and that the Occupying Powers in Western Germany would have concluded negotiations with the German Republic for the contractual arrangements intended to succeed the occupation regime. Negotiations for the European Defence Community have gone far but have been stalemated pending the outcome of debates in the German and French Parliaments. Negotiations for the contractual arrangements with the German Governments are also hanging fire. It would appear that the NATO Council at Lisbon can do little more than note progress to date and exhort the Governments concerned to speed up negotiations. Consideration can, however, probably be given to the prospective relationship between NATO and the EDC.

Other Issues

7. Among other issues of perhaps lesser importance likely to come before the Council are those of the Report of the Committee of Five, Infrastructure and Mediterranean Command.

8. A draft report of the Committee of Five on the North Atlantic Community was prepared by the Deputies of the Foreign Ministers concerned (Canada, Norway, Belgium, Holland and Italy). The draft report proposed action in such matters as the migration of labour for defence purposes, and development of a system of cultural exchanges among NATO countries. The draft, however, was not considered satisfactory by Mr. Stikker, the Netherlands Foreign Minister, because it paid little attention to economic problems of the North Atlantic Community. The report has been accordingly redrafted to take account of Mr. Stikker's comment.

9. The problem of financing infrastructure (fixed military facilities for common use in Western Europe)<sup>11</sup> has been before all recent Council meetings. Progress was made at Ottawa when an arrangement, more or less on an arbitrary basis, was reached for financing the most urgent requirements in airfields for the 1952 programme. No agreement has yet been reached for financing the 1953 programme. General Eisenhower has called the attention of the Council to this problem pointing out the danger that defence plans will be gravely jeopardized unless steps are taken immediately to enable construction to proceed.

10. A further problem is that of command in the Eastern Mediterranean and the Near East region. Both Greece and Turkey wish to come under the European Command of NATO rather than the proposed Middle East Command which would include Egypt and Arab countries. The British in particular have been most anxious to have Turkey participate in a Middle East Command. No solution having been reached at the military level, it is probable that the Council will be asked to resolve the issue at Lisbon.

- (5) Acceptance of the report of the Committee on the Atlantic Community;
- (6) Approval of recommendations of the Military Committee on various military matters. (These will not be discussed separately in this paper.)

During this session Mr. Pearson was Chairman of the Council and Mr. Claxton, Chairman of the meetings of Defence Ministers and of the Infrastructure Committee. General Foulkes was Chairman of the Military Committee.

European Defence Community and NATO

The Council was concerned chiefly with two aspects of the problem of the establishment of the European Defence Community:

- (1) the military effectiveness of the arrangements and the adequacy of the security controls; and
- (2) the political machinery for associating the Community with the North Atlantic Organization.

As a preliminary, reports were presented on the progress of the negotiation of the contractual relations and of the Paris talks on the EDC.

Mr. Eden expressed the opinion that the contractual agreements were now approaching a successful conclusion and that a satisfactory basis had been found on which to complete the work on the two complicated outstanding problems of the German financial contribution and the fulfilment of the Brussels Agreement on security safeguards. Once this is done no major obstacles will remain in so far as the German contractual settlement is concerned to delay German participation in Western defence.

Mr. Schuman explained that the main problems in Paris had now been solved and that in the very near future a Treaty would be signed. He repeated the French wish that the European Organization might one day be extended to other European countries and extended also in the economic and political spheres. He recalled that the French Parliament had expressly declared in favour of modifying certain clauses of the Treaty if this were necessary in order to enlarge the Community. He explained that as it is now taking shape, it meets the two objectives of providing German military strength for the defence of Europe, while at the same time establishing safeguards against the military strength of the Community being identified with Germany's desire to regain her lost territories.

The Military Committee had studied General Eisenhower's report on the military effectiveness of the organization of the European Army and approved it, while stressing the necessity of retaining a degree of flexibility in the military organization. This requirement of flexibility had given rise to some French and Belgian misgivings but they were met by changes in wording agreed in the Military Committee.

The Council Deputies reported on the linking of the legal obligations by a system of reciprocal consultation and combined meetings. This point had been thoroughly discussed at the tripartite meetings in London (U.S., U.K. and France) where a new form of words had been worked out to provide for the calling of a joint meeting by a member of either Organization when he considered his security or that of the Organization to be threatened.

The Deputies' report mentioned the identical objectives of NATO and the European Defence Committee, and later in the meeting, during the discussion of the communique, the French took some exception to this if it were to be interpreted as meaning that the EDC had no independent sphere of activity. To meet this objection the communique refers to their working one within the framework of the other in so far as the objective of strengthening the defence of the Atlantic area is concerned.

The Netherlands Foreign Minister, Dr. Stikker, sought information on three points, which he considered would have to be clarified before he could present the European Army plan to the Dutch Parliament. He felt these should all be cleared up now because once the Treaty is accepted, it is bound, in his opinion, to lead to further integration if not to federation. He had some anxiety about the priority in distributing the German contribution to defence costs and whether the economies foreseen would result in a decrease in the forces stationed in Germany. Also he was anxious to know whether the amounts for the next three years available for the German contribution to the European Defence Community would be sufficient to realize, together with the external aid, the military goals set for Germany.

Mr. Eden replied to these questions by stating that according to calculations, there will be enough in the present year on the basis of the contribution put down for Germany by the TCC Executive Bureau to cover what Germany can do in rearmament and the requirements of the EDC and the other Occupying Powers. Therefore, there is no question of priorities. Regarding the economies, Mr. Eden said that they have, in a considerable measure, already been made for this year and that there is no intention at all of reducing the Allied Forces, E.D.C., or U.K., or, as far as he knew, United States forces in Germany. The question of financing in the long-term period is a more difficult matter. It is agreed, however, that there should be consultation between the EDC and the U.S. and U.K. to decide on the figure and how it is to be divided and dealt with between the parties and what the programme is to be. It was Mr. Eden's thought that the assessment of German capacity in future years should be made on the same basis and by similar methods to that employed this year.

The various papers, including the draft protocol for the association of Germany with NATO were approved with a French amendment to a section of the joint report of the Deputies and the Military Committee so as to make it clear that no actual German troops would be raised before the Treaty is ratified. According to the amendment members will be invited to consider and initiate any measures which might be taken prior to or in anticipation of ratification in order to bring about, immediately after ratification, the raising of the German contribution to the EDC.

TCC Report

The Lisbon meeting saw the completion of the TCC exercise. The main report and supplementary report were accepted and the resolution, which had been prepared by the Executive Bureau adopted. All this took place with very little discussion in Council.

The Military Committee considered it most desirable that the TCC Report should be amended so as to take note of the force requirements which the military experts had fixed as necessary for 1952, a view which had General Eisenhower's support. The TCC agreed to this proposal and Council approved the figure set out in the Military Committee paper as firm goals for 1952.

The U.S. proposed an amendment to the draft resolution to provide for an examination of the Greek and Turkish military programmes on the same basis as the TCC examination. This was welcomed by the Council, and particularly by Greece and Turkey.

The most significant intervention during the discussion of the TCC Report was made by Mr. Eden, who delivered a statement prepared for him by Treasury officials who had come to Lisbon to make sure that the U.K. position was clearly recorded. Mr. Eden explained that the U.K. would do its utmost to carry out the TCC recommendations, but as the Report itself so clearly brings out, the U.K. capacity to do so depends on certain economic factors which are not wholly, or even largely, within their control. The most important of these are balance of payments difficulties and shortages of raw material. He went on to describe the present U.K. position as so grave and the risk to the whole U.K. economy as so great that unless the gold and dollar deficit can be covered by the middle of this year, the United Kingdom's defence programme will not only be retarded but indeed imperilled. This general caveat underlines, in a way that cannot be ignored, United Kingdom reliance on U.S. assistance. In welcoming the proposed annual review of defence programmes, the United Kingdom Foreign Secretary drew attention particularly to the need for an early study of the burden of maintaining the forces during the later stages of the build-up and when the build-up is complete. This problem, he pointed out, has been made more serious by the extension of the programme beyond 1954 so that, after 1954, Europe may have to face the combined burden of completing the build-up and maintaining the forces created.

The French made an addition to their comment on the TCC recommendation which weakened their already qualified acceptance. They had originally said "that France will not be in a position to put the plan in hand in its entirety while it remains alone in bearing the main brunt of the war in Indo-China, unless it receives without delay basic assistance of the kind recommended in the Report of the Temporary Council Committee." Now they confirm that their budgetary effort will be at least equal to the total figure of 1,190 million francs recommended by the TCC but add that this figure does not enable the targets of the Screening and Costing Staff to be reached. The French Government hope, nevertheless, that present discussions will lead to a solution enabling them to attain these targets in 1952, priority being given to the 14½ divisions of the Army raised according to the degree of preparedness fixed for France by the SCS.

Reorganization

The reorganization of the North Atlantic structure had been suggested by the TCC and discussed in the Council Deputies between the Rome<sup>13</sup> and Lisbon meetings. Agreement had been reached on the basic points with the exception of the terms of reference of the Secretary-General and the location of the permanent headquarters. It was decided that the question whether the Secretary-General should be Vice-Chairman and Chairman of the permanent Council should be left until it was known who would be appointed.

The location of the permanent headquarters could not be settled by the Deputies because of the determination of the United Kingdom that it should be in London. At a private gathering of Foreign Ministers in Lisbon, when the Big Three were absent, it became clear that only Portugal and Iceland really supported the United Kingdom choice, so at the meeting of Foreign Ministers on the final day, Mr. Eden withdrew his Government's insistence on London and cleared the way for agreement to centralize the civilian agencies in the vicinity of Paris. The United Kingdom insisted, however, on a form of words in the communique which, to them, made less embarrassing their retreat from a position which they had declared they were determined to hold. The communique states that "all civilian activities of the Organization will be concentrated in the geographical area where are situated other international agencies whose work is closely related to that of the Treaty Organization and with which close administrative connection is essential to efficiency. These are presently situated in the vicinity of Paris."

The choice of the Secretary-General was a more delicate matter for three of the most widely promoted candidates were at Lisbon. They were Mr. Stikker, the Foreign Minister of the Netherlands, Mr. Lange, the Foreign Minister of Norway, and Mr. Pearson, with Sir Oliver Franks, the U.K. Ambassador to Washington, being the fourth prominent candidate. After a very frank discussion in a closed meeting of Foreign Ministers, it was decided to invite Sir Oliver to be the first Secretary-General, but after deliberation, two days after the session closed, he announced he would not accept and the Deputies are now to propose to Governments a new candidate.

On the military side, the TCC Report had made some reorganization suggestions chiefly concerning the terms of reference of the Supreme Allied Commander Europe. In approving the military comments on the TCC Report, the new terms of reference for SACEUR, were also approved.

The Military Committee had worked out immediate command arrangements for the Greek and Turkish forces and these were approved by the Council. They provide that the Greek and Turkish ground and air forces assigned to NATO will operate under the overall command of SACEUR through the Commander-in-Chief Southern Europe. It is understood that there will be no intervening commander. In other words, they will not be under General Castiglione, the Italian commander of the ground forces in the Southern sector. Greek and Turkish naval forces will, for the time being, remain under national command pending settlement of all-over naval command arrangements in the Mediterranean now under further discussion by the Standing Group.<sup>14</sup>

Infrastructure

One great gap in the TCC exercise was the absence of any planning for infrastructure. On the recommendation of the French, infrastructure was included as an independent item on the Council agenda and General Gruenther, General Eisenhower's Chief of Staff, came to Lisbon to explain, both to the Military Committee and to the Council, the extreme importance which SHAPE attached to the Council reaching an agreement on sharing the cost of what is called the "hard core" of the third slice of infrastructure.<sup>15</sup> As <sup>15</sup>On appelait «tranches» les augmentations apportées au programme d'infrastructure. Additions to the infrastructure were known as "slices".

General Gruenther pointed out, there was little point in providing the air forces if the fields and facilities necessary for their operation were lacking. All this points to the necessity of including infrastructure in any subsequent review of defence programmes.

The costs of the Third Slice had originally been estimated at £256 million but this sum was drastically cut, partly by reduction in the standards of the facilities to be provided and also by elimination of all facilities for which construction did not have to begin in 1952. Nearly 90% of the costs of the final figure is for airfields. Two thirds of the remainder are for Signals and one third for Headquarters. General Gruenther of SHAPE and other authorities emphasized the extreme urgency of getting financial agreement so that the construction programme could begin immediately.

The greatest difficulties were encountered in reaching agreement on the division of the costs of the Third Slice. This was partly because the different countries could not accept any common principle or formula for cost sharing. (Exactly the same difficulty had been experienced in dividing Slices One and Two amounting respectively to £33 million and £80 million). In addition the United States was determined to reduce its proportionate contribution drastically below the 48% to which it was committed under the agreement reached at Ottawa on the cost of the Second Slice, and the United Kingdom was forced by its financial difficulties also to reduce its participation.

Mr. Claxton represented Canada on the special Committee of Ministers on Infrastructure and was in the Chair. He took the line that the only acceptable formula for cost sharing was capacity to pay as represented by the national incomes (gross national product) of participating countries. If in the common interest Canada went beyond this amount, it would have to be taken out of funds which otherwise would have been available for mutual aid.

After some hard wrangling, it was possible to reach an agreement on the amount and distribution of the Third Slice of infrastructure as follows:

	Millions of Pounds
Belgium & Luxembourg	10.0
Canada	8.1
Denmark	6.1
France	20.0
Italy	12.2
Netherlands	6.2
Norway	4.6
United Kingdom	20.0
United States	65.0
Total	152.0

The United Kingdom contribution will be furnished to the greatest extent possible in kind (due to the balance of payments difficulties in that country).

All countries agreed that if the costs of the physical programme covered by the Third Slice turned out to exceed £152 million, the additional costs would be borne pro rata by the countries listed above.

The share which Mr. Claxton undertook to recommend to the Canadian Government was £8.1 million or roughly $23 million at current exchange rates. For Canadian budgetary purposes this might be broken down approximately as follows:

On Infrastructure Account
In 1952/53	$10
In 1953/54	8
	<hr/>
	$18
On Mutual Aid Account
	5
	<hr/>
Total	$23

Committee on the North Atlantic Community

The report of the Committee of Five dealt with the following main topics: Economic Cooperation, Political Consultation and Movement of Labour. It also had sections on cooperation in the social and cultural fields and on information activities.

In the general sections, the report stressed that the process of achieving lasting and cohesive relationships between the countries of the North Atlantic Community is necessarily a slow one and that while it was necessary to give priority to steps aimed at strengthening our common defence, there was no incompatibility between work in the field of non-military cooperation and that of military cooperation.

In the economic field the report recognizes that the transformation of the Atlantic Community ideal into a reality will not be possible if economic collaboration does not develop and increase. In the view of the Committee, NATO has an important interest in the expansion and freeing of trade, and while there would be dangers and difficulties in attempting to liberalize trading policies and practices within a group where the members have important trading relations with other countries, NATO members should nevertheless study the role that they might play in the expansion and freeing of trade, working in cooperation with other bodies and in particular with the O.E.E.C. Specifically, some form of joint consultation and joint action with O.E.E.C. in the purely economic field might be agreed upon.

In the field of political consultation, nothing was really added to what was already put forward in the report to the Rome meeting. It is recognized that if the Council is reorganized and meets in continuous session, it will provide a valuable forum for facilitating and strengthening political consultation.

On the subject of the movement of labour between North Atlantic countries, the Committee concluded that there is scope within the NATO framework for useful and practical action in this important field. The Committee recommended to the permanent NATO Organization that the problems relating to the movement of labour should be kept under constant review.

The Committee did not feel that there was much that NATO could usefully do in the field of social cooperation that was not already being covered by other international bodies. In the cultural field, however, attention was directed to a limited number of experimental projects and some recommendations were made regarding informational activities.

In conclusion, the Committee recommended that when the NATO Council is reorganized to be in permanent session, the responsibilities of the Committee of Five should pass to the full Council because a body which represents only five of the NATO members has not proved to be the most effective agency for recommending programmes of specific action.

The Council approved the Committee's report and the recommendation regarding the transfer of functions to the permanent Council.

At this point in the discussion, the U.K. Foreign Minister recommended that a declaration be issued setting out anew the aims of the North Atlantic Treaty. The U.K. draft was well done but was full of brave words and resounding phrases like "construction of a united, peaceful world in which the safety, dignity and welfare of the individual shall be inviolable," and such questionable aims as working "towards the freest possible intercourse of men, money and goods." There were some doubts about the desirability of issuing such a declaration, but, re-written in more arid language, it was issued at the end of the communique.

CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN NATO

Section 3

CANADIAN DELEGATION

Composition, Functions and Procedure(a) Title

The Mission will be known as "The Delegation of Canada to the North Atlantic Council."

(b) Permanent Representative

The Delegation will be headed by a Permanent Representative who will represent the Government on the North Atlantic Council.

The Permanent Representative will be the Representative of Canada to the Organization for European Economic Cooperation.

The Permanent Representative will be responsible for the operation of the Mission and will have under his direction all officers and employees assigned to the Delegation by Departments of Government.

In assigning duties to the members of the Delegation, the Permanent Representative will bear in mind the special interests of the respective Departments of Government from which such members of the Delegation are drawn.

(c) Alternate Representative

The Permanent Representative may designate a senior member of the Delegation as Alternate Representative to act for him on the North Atlantic Council and in the Organization for European Economic Cooperation when the Permanent Representative is unable to act.

(d) Civilian Staff

The civilian staff of the Delegation will be drawn, in the first instance, from the Departments of External Affairs, Finance and Defence Production.

Since the Permanent Representative will represent the Government as a whole, all civilian members of the Delegation will report to and, normally, through him.

Instructions to the Delegation will be addressed to the Permanent Representative through the Department of External Affairs which will be the normal channel of communication to and from the Delegation for all Departments of Government.

On matters of a specialized nature of primary interest to a particular Department of Government, members of the Delegation may report directly to their own Departments keeping the Permanent Representative informed.

(e) Military Staff

The Delegation will include a Military Adviser who will assist the Permanent Representative on military questions coming before the Council.

The Military Adviser will be the representative on the Delegation of the Chiefs of Staff and their normal channel of communication with the Permanent Representative.

The Military Adviser will provide advice and information to the Delegation on military matters, liaison with the representatives at the Council headquarters of the Standing Group; he may also be called on to report on specific military questions for the Chiefs of Staff.

The Military Adviser shall keep the Permanent Representative fully informed of all matters coming to his knowledge which concern the work of the Council.

The Chiefs of Staff may designate a Deputy Military Adviser whose duties and responsibilities shall be those of the Military Adviser in the absence of the latter.

(f) Responsibilities of the Mission

The Delegation will have primary responsibility for reporting to the Government on all matters arising out of Canada's membership of NATO.

The Delegation will have primary responsibility for reporting on all matters arising out of Canada's association with the O.E.E.C.

Diplomatic Missions in NATO and O.E.E.C. countries will, of course, be expected to continue to report on subjects affecting the Atlantic Community and European integration, with special reference to the policies and interests of the countries to which they are accredited. The Delegation should, therefore, coordinate its reports with those of such other Missions and consult with them from time to time regarding such reports.

The Delegation will also report on the progress of the European Defence Community with which it will maintain liaison.

The primary contacts of the Delegation will thus be with NATO, OEEC and EDC. Official relations with the French Government will continue to be conducted through the Canadian Embassy in Paris. Nevertheless, it is recognized that, in practice, the Permanent Representative or members of the Delegation would have informal contacts with the Quai d'Orsay and other French departments dealing with questions arising in NATO and OEEC.

Close cooperation between the Paris Embassy and the Delegation will be important and the precise division of responsibility can be worked out in cooperation between the two Missions as questions of common interest are encountered. The Delegation will, in all probability, have to call upon the Embassy for assistance, particularly during the initial stages and in regard to administrative matters.

RESPONSIBILITIES OF THE MISSION

I. Introduction

At the time this Mission was established, the Secretary of State for External Affairs sent to the Prime Minister and to the Ministers of Finance, National Defence and Defence Production, copies of a paper, dated April 15, entitled "Canadian Participation in NATO." The paper reviewed the development of Canada's relationship to NATO, gave an account of the principles agreed upon at Lisbon for the re-shaping of the civilian side of the Organization, and set out what might be called the terms of reference of this Mission. This paper has been discussed previously with the Deputy Ministers of the three other departments concerned, who were in agreement with the contents of its third section which dealt with the functions of the Mission.

2. The letter transmitting this paper to Ministers pointed out that the developments in which the Mission was to participate were to a large extent experimental, and that, for this reason, the senior officials concerned had agreed that in six months' time the situation should be reviewed. It is the purpose of this report to set out our appreciation of the responsibilities of the Mission in the light of our experience to date, to assess the adequacy of our resources for the fulfilment of these responsibilities, and to recommend such changes in our terms of reference and establishment as may appear to us desirable.

3. As the Mission's responsibilities are not confined to Canada's participation in NATO but also include the conduct of our relations with OEEC, this report will touch as well on our work with this latter Organization and on certain other subjects with which we have been, or expect to be, concerned.

II. The North Atlantic Treaty Organization

The First Six Months

4. During the period since the establishment of this Mission, the civilian agencies of NATO have, necessarily, been much preoccupied with the problems of moving the headquarters from London to Paris and of re-organizing the international staff. At the same time, recruitment has been going on and the new Permanent Council has been working out methods for conducting its business in such a way as to meet the extended responsibilities laid upon it at Lisbon. In fact, NATO has been going through a difficult stage of adapting itself to a new environment as well as undertaking new and larger tasks. Finally, Lord Ismay himself, the newly-appointed Secretary-General, was until recently unfamiliar with the internal history of NATO and with the nature of some of its current problems. The same has been true of his principal assistants. In these circumstances, it was not unnatural that the first months of the new NATO did not afford a spectacle of marked efficiency or accomplishment. In fact, over this period all concerned with the future of the Alliance experienced a good measure of frustration and discouragement.
